Beginning to Realize.

Success Magazine for April has the following in regard to the Socialist party:

"Both republican and democratic politicians are beginning to realize the great growth and the tremendous scope and intensity of the Socialist party. At first the rise of Socialism was ignored; and then, when it could no longer be ignored, it was ridiculed. In 1900, the year when the present Socialist party first entered the national field, Eugene V. Debs, its candidate for president, polled 87,814 votes. Four years later, Debs, again the candidate, received nearly half a million votes. Since 1904 Socialism has been bounding forward and spreading at such a rate that the old party politicians, instead of ignoring or ridiculing it, are beginning to fight it aggressively; and recent state and municipal election returns show that the harder they fight it the more persistently it grows. The Socialist party is so organized that there is no possibility of any set of leaders deciding in advance who the candidate for president shall be. There are no leaders in the Socialist party, in the usual political sense. The national convention, and that only, will choose the candidates for president and vice-president."

For a number of years after Socialism made its appearance little attention was paid to it, and this only to ridicule, misrepresent and discredit it. In the popular mind it was usually coupled with anarchy, and the readers of capitalist papers were told that it was of foreign importation and that it could never strike root in American soil. In the meantime, Socialists continued their work of education and organization. To-day Socialism is recognized as a force in the land, and the Socialist party has taken its place among the national parties of the nation. Success says truly that both republican and democratic politicians are beginning to realize its growth and importance. They no longer ridicule it, nor do they dismiss it as a harmless theory, entertained only by crack-brained visionaries. They see in it a tremendous power which is still largely latent, but which in the next few years will express itself in a social revolution.—Appeal to Reason.

The Greatest Man.

William E. Channing said: "The greatest man is he who chooses the right with invincible resolution; who resists the severest temptations from within and without; who bears the heaviest of burdens cheerfully; who is calmest in storms and most fearless under menaces and frowns; whose reliance on truth, on virtue, on God, is most unflinching. I believe this greatness to be most common among the multitude, whose names are never heard."

The multitude that Channing had reference to was the toiling masses who make bricks, carry mortar, dig coal, heat furnaces, drive engines, sail ships, weave cloth, sew garments, build houses, scoop out canals, bore tunnels, span streams and chasms; the many unrequited heavily-laden millions who keep sleepless vigils every night, and who offer up their lives by thousands and are maimed by tens of thousands every day; whose bleaching bones pave the track of progress all the way from the lairs and jungles of the dim and distant past to what is now vaunted as "civilization"; the countless proletarian hosts who do all things, make all things, move all things; who feed and clothe and house all mankind—except themselves; conserve all things and beautify and multiply all things; who, in short, have carved this world out of the cosmos and given it to man. They, though they be nameless and fameless, are the truly great and the only great, and some day, by the Eternal, they shall inherit the earth!—Ibid.

The Source of Wealth.

The man who works for two dollars a day produces more than two dollars' worth of wealth. If he doesn't do this there is nothing in it for the employer; and employers do not employ unless there is something in it for them. It is the surplus wealth produced by the wage worker that makes his master wealthy, and gives him more power over those whom he hires. The object of Socialism is to establish an industrial system in which each worker would retain this surplus instead of turning it over to some capitalist or corporation. There is no way on earth by which capital can be accumulated save by the appropriation of this surplus; and there is no way by which the working class can hope to obtain more than an uncertain and precarious living for labor performed than by capturing political power, and thereby so re-organizing industry as to legally and effectively secure this surplus to the men whose labor produces it. Socialists are organized for the purpose of doing this thing; and, if you are a workingman, you owe it to yourself to throw all your power into the movement, and contribute to its inevitable success.—Ibid.

The wealth of the property-owner who does not work is the product of the propertyless men who do work.

There are two kinds of unemployed—the million workers who are on the tramp looking for work, and the thousands of capitalist parasites who are paid for doing nothing.

All those things upon which the people in common depend as a means of applying their labor, and thereby obtaining the material means of life, should by the people in common be owned and operated.
