Fooing the Wage Slaves.

Born in slavery, the negroes in the far south had no conception of freedom. Contrary to the opinion that prevails in the north, the slaves were not unhappy. Liberty being unknown, it was but natural for them to be satisfied with their condition, and particularly so as their material wants were satisfied. As a rule they were never overworked, were comfortably housed and well fed. Songs, music and dancing relieved the monotony of their existence. Being happy and contented, they loved their masters; and never to their knowledge having been told an untruth, they believed them as they did their God.

We are not attempting to defend slavery as an institution, but are only making a statement of the relations that existed between master and slave in the far southern states up to the rebellion. Criticizing these relations, it was then argued that even if the slaves lived in blissful ignorance, it was a crime not to educate them to appreciate liberty; that the careful attention shown was but what any wise owner of valuable property would do from self-interest.

At the beginning of the war the slaves were told that if the Yankees came they must flee; that the Yanks were devils, with horns and tails, who would surely kill them. So, upon the advance of the northern armies, there was a stampede of the terror-stricken negroes. With difficulty a few were overtaken and kept until they became satisfied their masters had lied, when they were sent out to spread the truth. Then came the reaction. The deception caused almost instant estrangement, the negroes transferring their esteem and loyalty to their liberators—a result contrary to that planned by the slave owners. Instead of fleeing from them, they began to flock to the union armies, and, knowing the country, their aid was invaluable. The lie proved a boomerang.

From the foregoing we may draw an analogy. Instead of the beneficent slave owner, we now have the arrogant capitalist; and in place of the happy chattel slave, we have the discontented "free only to starve" wage slave. The former slave at least enjoyed the blessing of economic peace; while under the capitalist system the toiler, to obtain a bare living, is subjected to all the horrors of cannibalistic competition. And, like unto the abolitionists of old, there are those who now preach the doctrine of political and industrial freedom. These men and women are Socialists, and their sole object is to hasten the long delayed answer to the prayer, "Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." Now the capitalists are setting up the cry of "bogeyman," their hirelings from pulpit, press and rostrum misrepresenting Socialism in every particular. In view of these falsehoods, perhaps the best definition of Socialism at present is: A system of society, the very opposite of what its opponents claim it to be.

As Lincoln truly said: "You cannot fool all the people all the time," so the working class, the world over, is beginning to catch a glimmer of the truth. The reaction has begun, and soon the "fooled" and exploited producers of wealth will stampede to Socialism. As the lie told concerning the Yankees hastened the end of slavery, so the lies now told of Socialism will quicken the death of capitalism and hasten the birth of the "Brotherhood of Man."—Marlon Fulton.

Give Them This.

When you meet a defender of capitalism, especially one who sneeringly declares that Socialism is impracticable, ask him if he knows that according to the statement of the principal insurance companies in their prospectuses:

A very large majority of men die quite poor.

Out of every one hundred persons who engage in business, two succeed and ninety-eight fail.

These are the results of the exceedingly "practical" system known as capitalism.

Ask your capitalist friend what he thinks of a social system in this age of modern machinery, when everything can be produced in such great abundance, in which a vast majority die in poverty, while ninety-eight out of every hundred who engage in business are doomed to failure, bankruptcy, misery, crime or death.

And yet, opposing this insanity, this chaos, this appalling exhibition of plutocracy and poverty, riotous extravagance and shocking indigence, is sure evidence of being unbalanced and of having "impractical" designs upon society.

The fact that under capitalism nearly all men are failures, and a large majority of them die in the grasp of poverty, is enough in itself to condemn it and demand its overthrow.

What do you think of a system that produces such a complete crop of failures, and dooms most of those born under it to live and die in poverty?—Appeal to Reason.

Socialism is for stopping the robbery of the workers, and believes that, this being done, poverty will disappear from the earth.

Socialism is against the murder of the workers in war, and against the use of the people's money in preparation for this murder.
