Objections.

When you are out stump speaking, you run against the stock questions. Here are a few of them:

"What will you do with the lazy people under Socialism?"

There are three classes of lazy people, the capitalists, the unfit, and the healthy tramps who won't work. Under Socialism, the capitalists will lose their unearned revenues. They will have to work, if they are able to. Socialism, by depriving them of their unearned revenues, will force them into the ranks of the useful workers. The unfit are in another class. These unfit persons are usually the result of bad economic conditions surrounding them, or which surrounded their parents before they were born. A child may be born tired because its parents were overworked and underfed and ill-fed before its birth. Or it may have acquired a tired feeling by being underfed in its infancy. Good food, fresh air, healthful surroundings and short hours of labor for all will eliminate this class of the unfit. The third class is the healthy tramp who won't work. Personally, I admire the tramp. He has more spunk and manhood in him in refusing to work and be robbed than has the conscientious slave who diligently attends to the business of the capitalists and gets robbed of three-quarters of the wealth he produces. Under Socialism, when each will get the full social value of what he produces, the tramp will find it far easier to get a living by doing useful work than he can by tramping it. Then he will turn to work and give up his tramp ways. There may be a few old tramps who will not change; but they will die out and their class will become extinct. If there should be any persons who will not work after we have attended to the above, we will set the doctors at work examining them for the hook worm.

"Who will provide the capital under Socialism?"

The workers will provide the capital. They do it now. Capital is that part of wealth which is used to produce more wealth. Nature supplies the raw material. The workers change that raw material into things good for the use of man. They produce the capital, for they build the factories and lay the railroads, and make the machinery and dig the gold and manufacture the bank notes. The working class collectively produce the capital. Under Socialism they will collectively own what they have collectively produced.

"Labor cannot get along without capital, can it?"

No. Under modern conditions it cannot. But the workers could get along very nicely without the private capitalists. Socialism does not aim at abolishing capital. It simply aims at abolishing the private capitalist by making capital the collective property of the working class. In Montreal I found two definitions of capital current, and as a result, when the above question was asked, some speakers declared that capital would be socialized, and others declared that it would be abolished. The former speakers declared that capital was wealth which was used for the production of more wealth. This, of course, will be socialized. The latter speakers declared that capital was that part of wealth which will be used to exploit labor. As, under Socialism, there will be no part of wealth which will be used to exploit labor, it follows that there will be no capital, and capital will be abolished. I think it best to use the first definition, although both are incomplete and inaccurate.

"If a man works and makes a fortune, should he not enjoy it?"

Certainly he should. But most men who get a fortune do not make it. They steal it from the useful workers. It is true that many capitalists work hard. So do burglars and slave raiders and highwaymen. But if a highwayman holds up a coach and gets away with a few thousand dollars, no one thinks of saying that the highwayman has "made" a fortune. The capitalists do not "make" fortunes. They steal them. We Socialists will prevent the capitalist steals, and so will allow the man who "makes" or produces wealth to enjoy the social value of what he has made.

"Socialism will destroy ambition."

No, it will not. It will make men ambitious. You can't make men ambitious by just giving them a bare living, and taking away from them all the rest of the wealth they have produced. It is not robbery that makes men ambitious. They are ambitious in spite of it. A good many workers start out with the idea that they can become prosperous by hard work. So they work hard, stay poor and lose their ambition. It is the height of folly to say that it will make men ambitious to give them the result of what their toil has produced.

There are many other foolish objections urged to Socialism. But the above seem to be the chief questions and objections used. The Montreal public, at least, have got beyond the stage of thinking that Socialism means dividing up, and that it will break up the home or destroy religion.—Cotton's Weekly.

Surely a system that keeps men from getting employment, and forces women and children into factories, is wrong. When the co-operative commonwealth is established, your child will have an equal opportunity with any child on earth.
