Practical Hints and Observations on Get-

rather than an advantage. And in sunny weather and warm climates the chickens seek a cool, shaded spot rather than a brightly-lighted, heated places. Still, one or two glass windows are advisable during winter even in a severe climate; that is, if tight-fitting, solid wooden shutters are provided and they are carefully closed at night.

houses have them less than seven or eight coop more than one would believe. feet high, and many even more, and the poultry compelled to alight on a hard wooden floor, or in winter on the frozen is frequently a sourse of serious injury, causing in the roosters what is called "bumble-foot," a swelling and enlargement of the exposed tender portions of the feet, and to the hens resulting often in internal wounds. Where lighter breeds are kept these high perches teach them to fly for which we afterward blame the enterprising young pullets and cockerels when a five-foot paling fails to restrain them.

to them, while sitting and hatching, will be North. greatly increased, if they have an apartment separate from the laying hens, and if no chickens are allowed to roost in either of the apartments devoted to the sitting and the laying hens much greater cleanliness may be maintained and consequently the danger from vermin will be lessened. If brooding hens could have a small run to themselves where they would not be molested by other fowls, and in which food and drink could be placed so that they might come off and feed at will, a much better hatch would be secured, with less time and worry from the attendant. The for which Toronto prices will be paid at natural instinct of the fowls such matters is a much better guide than our human intelligence. Besides, if a sitting hen has access to the general run, the other hens will have access to her nest. the fall the fencing usually needs some re pairs, either for security or to make the inclosures smaller; for as a rule it is better to restrict the flock to smaller range in very cold or stormy weather when a long range sometimes results in frosted combs and toes. Thorough-Bred Berkshire Boar, On bitter cold days it is best to keep the whole flock in doors, and the house should be large enough to accommodate them.

During the summer and fall the thoughtful poultry keeper will provide winter food for his flock. If this is grown on the farm it must be stored in some convenient and safe receptacle, secure alike from the depredations of rats and from the inroads of the rain pouring, how thankful we are if everyvariety to choose from and it may be had at 3rd; by King Phippin, Exquisite 2nd; by lower prices. Prices usually advance with the season, and all such things come cheaper Robin. King Charley, Exquisite 1st; by Young when bought by the quantity. Sweet clover hay probably affords the greatest amount of nutriment for the price, and on account of its bulkiness it is especially valuable in winter when the diet of fowls is apt to be too concentrated. If cured in the shade clover better retains its fresh green color and its strength, and when cut into halfinch lengths, scalded, steamed and sprinkled over with wheat bran it forms one of the loans at 6 per cent. most wholesome and valuable of foods. Next, provide some grain rich in albuminoids, as wheat, oats or buckwheat, some of each being preferable to any one alone. Last, but not least, a generous quantity of Indian corn, which, though much has been said and written against it, has, nevertheless, a place of its own that nothing else can Winter vegetables, as potatoes, cabbage or turnips, may be fed raw or cooked. The requisite supply of some kind of grinding material, oyster shells and sharp gravel must not be forgotten. A barrel of lime is of much use when conveniently placed so that a small quantity may be scattered about the house and yard once a week. Before the winter rains set in be sure to collect an ample supply of dry dust or sand. Even if the poultry house has a good floor, it will be more easily cleaned if liberally sprinkled over after each sweeping and scraping, and where fowls are kept in confinement something of this sort is necessary as a deoderizer and to give them something to scratch among for exercise.

The long, cold winter is the most trying season for the inmates of our poultry yards, and anything which we can do to lessen its severity or relieve its monotony will be gladly welcomed and promptly repaid by our grateful charges.

A Folding Hen Roost.
