But ere long other trials came; in a few years death had carried off her mother, and the once happy home was a broken one.

Many years now had Miss Winnifred been living in her little home, winning to herself, as time passed on, friends of all ages and classes.

On this special morning, Miss Winnifred had almost finished drawing her delicate bits of China and old mahogany furniture.

Miss Winnifred smiled as she took the unlocked letter. Closing the front door, she went slowly into the sitting room, and sat down.

moved, and as Miss Winnifred bent her head lower to catch his words, his eyes opened, and rested on her.

Dear Madam: There is in this hospital a dying man injured in the late railroad accident, whose constant cry is for you.

By the time Miss Winnifred had finished reading this letter, her hands trembled so that she could scarcely hold it.

The man stirred in his sleep; his lips had been brought there yesterday morning in an unconscious condition.

His eyes were closed, but the long lashes resting on his cheeks were dark, and his moustache was only tingled with gray.

And now Philip was dying, his life was rapidly ebbing away, and he would soon be far beyond the sound of her voice.
