THE UNION OF LORD CREWE AND LADY "PEGGY" PRIMROSE.

Gossip About the Pair of Them-His Lordship the Best Type of an Aristecrat and Her Ladyship a True Daughter of a Grandly Noble House-Characteristic Details.

The engagement of Lord Crewe to ate but also collateral relations. Lady Margaret, or, as she is almost universally known, Lady "Peggy" Primrose, is now au fait accompli. It had been whispered for some time in society that such an engagement was likely to come off; but until the official announceof Lord Rosebery with his daughter to Crewe Hall, the seat of Lord Crewe, apparently brought this to a climax.

For several years Lord Crewe has been regarded by more than one anxious mother as one of the most desirable partis. He has been a widower for a long time-indeed, his attachment to his dead wife was so entire, was so profound, and his grief at her loss was so terrible, that many of his relatives thought he would never have married again. The years he has remained a widower are proof of the sincerity of both his affection and his sorrow—especially as, filling great places, such as that of Lord Lieutenant of Irehis own country, he must have missed the companionship of a wife very greatly. Lord Crowe is a man of such pronounced individuality that it is not difficult to describe him. Except that he is dark, and not blonde, he might be spoken of as a man who could never be mistaken for anything but an Englishman wherever he was found. Tall, slight, and yet with the air of an athlete, with taut muscles and splendid nerves, he has a given to France, and is sustained by no peculiarly knightly air-if the word be permissible. In the long, thin face, in the fine eyes, in the expression, at once selfrestrained and suggestive of resolution, deep thoughts, strong emotions-in the clear, alert, straight figure, there are all the grace and distinction of the well-bred Englishman. An expression, at once of hauteur and of shyness, completes the picture of that type, the uniqueness of which -Men's Fine Boots in Box Calf, Dongola or has struck foreigners alternately with Tan Vici Kid, all with Goodyear Welt, a admiration and with amusement during stylish thick-soled Walking Boot, very all the generations they have been considering the aristocratic and the travelling inherited considerable wealth among the coalfields of Yorkshire. In Yorkshire he has a fine old house, known as Frystona house in which Carlyle stopped on the any business." way to speak in Scotland as head rector of a university, the speech which brought the poor old litterateur at once a letter of burning affection and admiration from his wife, and, a few hours afterwards, the news that she was dead. There is a very amusing and at the same time pathetic account of this visit in the essays of Professor Tyndall. Fryston is in a ring fence of railways; the whistling of the engines kept the dyspeptic sage awake all night, and he was in such a maniacal temper next morning that he made up his mind to leave that day-whether his host liked it or not. Tyndall persuaded him to try a ride with him next day; for two hours the two philosophers dashed gown which Boehm represents so well in his statue at Chelsea, and Whistler so perfectly in his immortal picture, and coursed delightfully for hours.

It was through a rich and generous uncle that Lord Crewe received his title. This uncle, unmarried and childless, always treated Lord Houghton as his heir. Lord Houghton was sent to Ireland as Lord-Lieutenant when the Gladstone Ministry of 1892 was formed, and when Mr. Morley was last Chief Secretary for Ul Ireland. Lord Houghton, as representative of a Home Rule Government, had rather a rough time-indeed, some of his levees were openly boycotted-but he maintained his equanimity-which, as they are semi-regal in style, required the VILLA Paints, prepared for immed- distinction of manner which Lord Houghton so eminently has. His political friends felt that he was entitled to recognition; his uncle died-as Lord Houghton's vice-royalty was about to closeleaving him his wealth, and the Ministry at once conferred upon him the vacant earldom. Lord Crewe has a splendid mansion near Crewe; lives in London, in that tiny but distinguished little street off Park lane called Tilney street—he has Lord Brampton, by the way, as a neighbor; entertains largely in both town and country, and is fond of the society of sportsmen, of litterateurs and of politicians-in other words, of the representatives of his own many-sided interests. The son-in-law of a Prime Minister that was, and that may be again, Lord Crewe will probably now fill great offices. He is just the man to be made Viceroy of India, in case there should be a vacancy when his party is again in power. Lady "Peggy" Primrose, though she has been "out" for only a year or so, is already a well-known figure in London society. Lord Rosebery, with all his modernity in politics, has been quite a father of the old school in bringing up his Secretary daughters. They were brought up in what might almost be called seclusion until the time for making their appearance in public came. They were educated at home, and under the charge of a lady of great refinement and many accomplishments. This lady did not live in Dalmeny Park, but in a house close by, and came over every day to attend to the Opp. Benson House, - - Lindsay education of her young charges. The young ladies do great credit to their teacher. Their manners are quite perfect

-at once modest and self-possessed. The two sisters made their debut together. They were joint hostesses at a splendid entertainment given by Lord Rosebery at his house in Berkeley square the season before last. All London was there-social, artistic, political. The two deaths. young girls stood at the head of the stairs, and were introduced by their father to all his guests. They did the duties of hostess as well as if they had been at it all their lives. In appearance, the two sisters are singularly like each other, and singularly like their distinguished father. They have his stronglymarked features, and a good deal of his repose of expression. The rich brown coloring of the complexion is a reminiscence of their mother, who, as everybody knows, was a Rothschild, and one of the greatest heiresses even in that family of colossal wealth. The girls have both large fortunes, which were from immedi-

The Ladies Primrose are always beautifully dressed. In London society it has been the young married woman who, in recent years, has insisted on having the best clothes and the most attention. They are credited with having set the example ment, it was impossible for anybody to of young ladies being turned out as well make any public allusion to it. The visit as married women. Lady "Peggy" has inherited some of the intellectual gifts. as well as physical resemblance, from her father. As everybody knows, the Duchess of Cleveland, Lord Rosebery's mother, is upwards of 80 years of age-and in spite of that, one of the most active beings in existence. Mrs. Asquith, on the other hand-who was once Miss Margot Tennant-is, it is equally known, a perfect type of modernity-her daring independence, her wit, her deep interest in the intellectual as well as the sporting interests of men. One night, Lady "Peggy," seeing Lord Rosebery between the Duchess of Cleveland and Mrs. Asquith, exclaimed: "Look at Papa, seated between land, and one of the leaders of society in | the last century and the next!" Isn't it a little like what Lord Rosebery himself would have said?

In other centers of the province the consumption is even higher, it amounts, for instance, to 19 liters at Lillebonne. In the department of the Seine-Inferieure -that is, the Havre district-there is a drink shop for every 67 inhabitants. The women are also hard drinkers, and Lord Crewe was not born with the drink is supplied to them by the grocer, title, nor, indeed, was he legally heir to the green grocer and even by the men it.
