ECHO OF A TRAGEDY.

STORY OF A PORTRAIT AND THE MAN WHO STOOD UNDER IT.

The Man Belonged to a Noble French Family, but Was an Impoverished Exile-Original of the Portrait the Cause of His Family's Ruin.

The family had rented a house in the mountains not far from New York. The region had been settled as early as any in the country hereabout, and the houses were as fine specimens of old colonial residences as any available for summer occupancy. So the New York family settled themselves there with satisfaction. The house had been for a great many years' the home of a family well known in the history of the United States. The usual decorations of the house were not disturbed by the summer tenants The family portraits hung about the walls, and over the mantel in one room was the picture of a woman. Just who she was the summer occupants of the house took

He was poor, desperately poor, with a threatening burden of debt. His wife had nothing beyond her beauty and her devotion to him. It was late in the autumn when they arrived, and the first of their visits to the country brought them to this old village. They knew the New Yorkers living in the old house and an invitation

Pure accident led the young nobleman woman. The room was large and shad owy, and the lights were low. Probably he never saw the face.

Possibly he would not have recognized it. But it had, nevertheless, exercised a large influence upon his fortunes. It was through the influence of the woman whose portrait hung in the living room of the old New England house that this young man was an exile from his own land because he had not the fortune to live there, and this although she died before he was born One of the guests at dinner that night knew the original of the portrait and her history. He knew the young man, too and when he saw him and the portrait so close together the "long arm of coinci-

"The young man who was standing to night under that woman's portrait," the guest said, "might have carried one of the most exalted titles in Europe today and might have had one of the largest private fortunes had it not been for that woman She was perhaps the innocent cause of this young man's ill fortune, just as she was supposed to have borne no part in the evil that brought a famous tragedy on his ancestors. She was an English governess in the family of a French duke. He was rich and his family ranked with the oldest. His wife was as proud as he was, and when there came into her mind a distrust of the English woman's honesty and the duke's fidelity, it was not a matter which she allowed to pass with the lightness Which people are accustomed to associate with matters of this kind in French socie ty. She demanded that the girl be driven from the house, hurriedly and ignomin iously, with no chance for question or jushimself from his wife's charges, and said that the woman could leave the house under circumstances in which she could carry her reputation with her. But he refused to turn her out at his wife's command. The duchess went, so long as the English woman was allowed to remain. "After awhile the duchess returned to her home. It was understood that the English governess was to leave, now that " 'Is madame la duchesse at home?'
