RIGHTED AT LAST.

A well dressed old gentleman paused in the street to ask a small boy shivering in front of a dry-goods store what he was crying about.

"I-I've been discharged," was the tearful reply, "and I don't like to tell mother, we are so poor already."

"What does your mother do to make a living ?" asked the old man kindly.

"She takes in sewing, and the $2.50 were such a help; but now"---Here he burst into a flood of tears and could say no more.

take me to your mother and we will get her consent to the arrangement."

The boy smiled through his tears and they set out together towards his home.

"There's my grandpa's house," said he as they passed an elegant mansion.

"What's his name !"

"John Warlow." glance.

"And yours?"

"Walter Boyd." "Do you ever see your grandfather?" The boy hesitated a moment and then said "No, sir" Then in a few words he told the story how his mother had quarreled with her father for marrying against his wishes. The old gentleman gave another quick look, but again Walter failed to notice it. His eyes just then were turned longingly toward a window containing a tempting display of holiday goods, it being Christmas Eve.

man, and the two entered the shop. The gentleman picked out a costly pocket knife with ever so many queer brilliant stock of treasures. At last they reached the ungainly tenement in which Walter's mother occupied a poorly furnished room up four flight of stairs. As he looked upon her face the old gentleman seemed strangely moved; and there was a noticeable quiver in his voice as he mentioned to the widow his offer to the same time apprised her.

added: "It's only to bind the bargain and hired," keep anyone from getting ahead of me. Of course you needn't answer till you've learned more about me."

"Then, while Walter was busy telling Sissy of the wonderful things he had seen he said—"John, I fear I have kept you in the toy shop, the accentric little gentleman slipped his two purchases to Mrs. Boyd, with an injunction to put the wonderful knife in Walter's stocking that night and the wax doll in Sissy's, after which he took a hasty leave.

It was quite dark when he mounted the steps of the stately mansion of Walter's How a Hardened Sinner Helped Bishop grandpa.

"Tell Mr. Warlow I wish to see him, said the little gentleman to the servant who answered the bell.
