He is given every educement to become a good, solld man, hether for continuation as a member of man-of-war's ship's company or for the arning of a livelihood ashore. The officers the American navy give the apprentice oys considerably the better of it over the bluejackets who ship as such in all that concerns their interest and advancement. and the boy who during the period that he wears the apprentice's figure of eight knot in his mustering shirt goes wrong and beomes a rowdy and a sea lawyer has only is innate cussedness to blame for it. The boy who at the outset of his naval life sheds a lonesome tear or two in his hammock, but who keeps up a brave front who may be always marked for a winner.

It would be out of nature for a youngster of any sort of sensibilities whatsoever to plunge into man-of-war life, with all of its apparent rigidity at first sight, without being a bit taken aback and oppressed by won, but in no environment is the parade of even the slightest suspicion of sentimentality more quickly frowned upon than upon the forward deck of a man-of-From the purely physical point of view apprenticeship in the navy is a fine thing for a lad. Nine out of ten naval apprentices when they attain their majorities are strapping, rugged, brawny men, capable of enduring any amount of hardship and possessing a quality of health and soundness that is bound to see them through many ups and downs ashore should they elect to quit the sea when they reach the age of 21, which not many of them do, by the way. Of course in order to get into the navy at all the apprentice must be sound of body, but many of the lads only get into the service by narrow margins, owing to their being undersized or of no very rugged character of physical make Once they get to work on the decks of a man-of-war, providing there is nothing latent and constitutional the matter with them, it is amazing to see how the lads begin to spread and grow. They are put through the most exacting exercises, quite aside from their dally bit of heavy work-exercises that are designed to bring every muscle of the body into play-and the result is that they very soon begin to expand, and the steel gets into their mus-iles, there to remain as long as they live. When the apprentices emerge from their apprenticeship and ship over as full fledged bluejackets at the seaman gunner rate, they are given first call in the distribution of petty officer prizes and are, as stated, eligible for the promotion to the rank of warrant officers. For these reasons apprentices are never called upon during the service as boys to perform any menial tasks on shipboard. The whole idea of naval apprenticeship in the American navy is to inculcate uprightness, dignity and manliness into the lads, for upon the character of these boys the future of the waited upon the Attorney-General to forward ends of American men-of-war is lask that the Government take steps to known to depend.—Philadelphia Times.
