Strength Out of Weakness

Many men, once strong, seem suddenly to lose their energy and strength and gradually sink lower and lower until they are but a wretched wreck of their former selves. Some ascribe one reason for this and some another and, in fact, it is very difficult to determine just what is the matter with them; but in a large proportion of cases it is safe to take it for granted that the most of the whole trouble is a neglected cold causing serious disorders of the lungs.
