WHITE & BRO., NIPASSING IRON WORKS.

WOODVILLE ONTARIO.

It Was To Be.

Mrs. Reynolds's, Nellie's mother, and Mrs. Fremont, the mother of Charlie, had been school-girls together, and during that time had formed a long and lasting friendship.

Although living many miles apart, and both surrounded by domestic duties, this affection seemed rather to grow stronger as the years passed by, and, in order to still further cement the attachment, they adopted the idea of plighting the faith of Nellie and Charlie in their infancy.

With this design in view, the childhood years of Nellie Reynolds and Charlie Fremont were passed, and after each had secured a satisfactory education, and while Charlie is on a tour abroad, we find Nellie living with her aunt, her mother having died two or three years before our story opens.

Charlie Fremont was a young man of excellent character, decidedly good-looking, and possessing a fortune. The marriage contract formed by the mother was by him considered binding; and, although he had not seen Nellie for many years, he did not doubt but she entertained the same view, and would be willing to consummate their desire as he was.

Nellie took quite a different view of the matter, and on the arrival of her cousin Fred, the only son of her aunt, Mrs. Rivers, lost no time in explaining the situation, and appealing to him for aid to avert what she considered a dire calamity.

"I know of a pleasant country school you might possibly get," replied Fred, "if you were willing to turn governess."

"Oh, that would be delightful, Cousin Fred!"

A month passed, and we find Nellie in charge of a pleasant school situated some thirty miles from her former home. The hour is four p.m., school is out, and Nellie is seated at her desk in the school-room absorbed in the contents of a letter just received from Cousin Fred. The letter states that Charlie Fremont had gone to the country to visit some relatives, and intended to remain a few weeks. Fred had promised to keep Nellie acquainted with the movements of this individual during her exile in the country; and she was thinking how greatly she might have been enjoying herself at some fashionable watering place, when the door opened, and a tall, handsome young man walked in. He was dressed in a light suit, with broad-brimmed straw hat, and carried some fishing tackle.

"I beg your pardon," said he, "There seems to be a storm coming up, and I thought I might find shelter here until it had passed over."

"Be seated," said Nellie, looking anxiously towards the window, from which could be plainly seen the fast approaching clouds.

"Do not be alarmed," said he; "the storm will soon pass over."

As he had said, the storm did pass over, after which he walked from the school-room with his new acquaintance. On being told where she was lodging, he considered himself fortunate, as her landlord was an acquaintance of his.

This was the beginning of many happy hours for Nellie.

One afternoon she was quite surprised, as well as pleased, on returning home from one of her long rides, to see her cousin, and he, in turn, seemed to be as much astonished on seeing her escort.

"Why, Nellie," said he, "I thought you ran away from London to avoid meeting Charlie Fremont?"

"So I did," said she.

"Well, how is it you are so contented in his company to-day?"

"You are mistaken, Fred; this is Mr. Fremont."

"Indeed! I have had the honor of knowing this gentleman for several years as Charlie Fremont."

"Pardon me, Nellie," said Charlie Fremont; "you mistook the name that evening at your school room, and I did not think it worth while to correct you; they are so much alike."

"So it seems," replied Nellie.

"Now, don't be angry, Nellie," said Charlie; "remember you have just promised to be my—"

"Never mind what I have promised," replied Nellie; "promises are not always kept. You and Fred conspired, and I have serious thoughts of withdrawing from the compact."

But she did not; and soon a grand wedding took place at Mrs. Rivers', and Nellie says she will always love Cousin Fred, for if it had not been for him she never would have married the man of her choice.
