But some day, if by chance you should hear the world's verdict, try to remember that, whatever I may have been, I did my best to behave like a man of honor to you." She did not answer, but droppe her head on to her hands and sobbed as if her heart would break. Then, regaining her composure a little, she stood up again and faced me, Holding out her hand, she said: "You have told me that you love me. I have said that I love you. You say that we must part. Let it be so. You know best. May God have mercy

I tried to say "Amen," but voice refused to serve me, and as turned and looked across the sea I felt the hot salt tears rolling down my cheeks. By the time I recovered my self-possession she had left me and had gone below.

CHAPTER X.

Seven o'clock next morning found us entering Table Bay, our eventful journey accomplished. Overhead towered the famous mountain from which the Bay derives its name, its top shrouded in its cloth. At its foot reposed the town with which my destiny seemed so vitally connected, and which I was approaching with so much trepidation. As I stood on the promenade deck and watched the land open out before me, my sensations would have formed a good problem for a student of character. With a perception rendered abnormally acute by my fear, I could discern the boat of the port authorities putting off to us long before I should, at any other time, have been able to see it. It had yet to be discovered whether or not it contained a police official in search of me. As I watched her dipping her nose into the seas, and then tossing the spray off from either bow, in her haste to get to us, she seemed to me to be like a bloodhound on my track. The closer she came the more violently my neart began to beat, until it was as much as I could do to breathe. If only I could be certain that she was conveying an officer to arrest me. I felt I might find pluck enough to drop overboard and so end the pursuit for good and all. But I did not know, and the doubt upon the point decided me to remain where I was and brave the upshot.

As I watched her, I heard a footstep upon the deck behind me. I turned my head to find that it was Miss Maybourne. She came up beside me, and having glanced ashore at the city nestling at the foot of the great mountain, and then at the launch coming out to meet us, turned to address me. "Mr. Wrexford," she began, "I am favor, and I want you to promise me to grant it before I tell you what it "I'm afraid I can hardly do that," answered. "But if you will tell me what it is, I will promise to do it for you if it is in any way possible." "It is this," she said: "I want you in the event of my father not meeting me, to take me home. Oh don't say no, Mr. Wrexford, I want you so much going to ask you to do me a great to do it. Surely you will not deny me the last request I make to you?" She looked so pleadingly into my face that, as usual, it required all my courage not to give way to her. But the risk was too great for me even to contemplate such a thing for a moment. My rescue of the daughter of Cornelius Maybourne, and my presence in Cape Town, would soon leak out, and then it would be only a matter of hours before I should be arrested. Whatever my own inclinations may have been, I felt there was nothing for it but for me to refuse. "I am not my own master in this matter," I replied, with a bitterness which must have shown her how much in earnest I was. "It is impossible that I can remain so long in the place. There are the most vital reasons in the world against it. I can only ask you to believe that."

I saw large tears rise in her eyes EXPENSES OF LOAN kept down though she turned hurriedly away in To see her weep, however, was more than I could bear, and under the influence of her trouble my resolutions began to give way. After all, if I was destined to be arrested, I might just as well be taken at Mr. Maybourne's house as elsewhere-perhaps better. Besides, it was more than likely, in the event of no warrant having been issued, Mr. Maybourne, whose influence, I had been told, was enormous in the colony, might prove just the very friend of all others I wanted. At any rate, if I were not taken before the time came for going ashore, I would do as she wished. I told her this, and she immediately thanked me and went down below again.

Just as I announced my decision the launch came alongside, and a moment later her passengers were ascending the accommodation ladder, which had been lowered to receive them. They were three in number, and included—so I was told by gentleman who stood beside me-the harbor master, the officer of health, and another individual, about whose identity my informant was not quite assured. I looked at the last-named with no little apprehension; my ner-vousness endowed him with all the attributes of a police official, and my mind's eye could almost discover the manacles reposing in his coat pocket. I trust I may never pass through such another agonizing few minutes as I experienced then. I saw the party step on to the spar deck, where they shook hands with the purser and chief officer, and watched them as they ascended to the promenade deck and made their way towards the bridge. Here they were received by the skipper. I leaned against the rails, sick with fear and trembling in every limb, expecting every moment to feel heavy hand upon my shoulder, and to hear a stern voice saying in my ear-"Gilbert Pennethorne, I arrest

But minute after minute went by and still not one came to speak the fatal words. The ship, which had been brought to a standstill to pick up the boat, had now got under weigh again, and we were approaching close again, and we were approaching closer and closer to the docks. In less than half an hour I should know my

We soon se me mets sereil in dock, and everyone was looking after his or her luggage, saying "good after his or her luggage, saying "good-bye" and preparing to go ashere, I began to look about me for Miss May-bourne. Having found her we went to the chart-room together to bid the Captain "good-bye," and to thank him for the hespitality and kindness he had shown us. The dector had next to be discovered, and when he had been assured of our gratitude, we made enquiries for Mr. Maybourne, it soon became evident that he was set foot on South African soil. and the authorities convinced that we had nothing to declare, I hailed a cab and invited Miss Maybourne to instruct the driver in which direction he was to proceed. Half an hour later we had left the city behind us, and were driving through the suburbs in the direction of Mr. Maybourne's residence. After following a pretty road for something like a mile, on either side of which I noticed a number of stately residences, we found ourselves confronted with a pair of large iron gates, behind which was a neat lodge. But for the difference in the vegetation, it might very well have been the entrance to an English park. Through the trees ahead I could distinguish, as we rolled along the wellkept drive, the chimneys of a noble residence; but I was quite unprepared for the picture which burst upon my view when we turned a corner and had the whole house before us. Unlike most South African dwellings, it was a building of three stories, surmounted by a tower. Broad verandahs ran round each floor, and the importance of the building was enhanced by the fact that it stood on a fine terrace, which again led down by a broad flight of steps to the flower gardens and orangery. A more delightful home could scarcely be imagined; and when I saw it, I ceased to wonder that Miss Maybourne had so often experessed a preference for South Africa as compared with England. When the cab drew up at the front door I jumped out, and was about to help my companion to alight when I heard the front door open, and next moment a tall, fine-looking man, about sixty years of age, crossed the verandah and came down the steps. At first he regarded me with a stare of surprise, but before he could ask me my business, Miss Maybourne had descended from the vehicle and was in his arms. Not desiring to interrupt them in their greetings I strolled down the path. But I was not permitted to go far before I heard my name called. I turned, and went back can I help you?" to have my hand shaken off by Mr. Maybourne.

"My daughter says you have saved her life," he cried. "I'll not ask questions now, but I thank you, sir-from the bottom of my heart I thank you. God knows you have done me a service the value of which no man can

The warmth of his manner was so much above what I had expected that it left me without power to reply. "Come in, come in," he continued in a voice that fairly shook with emotion. "Oh, let us thank God for this happy day!" He placed his arm round daughter's waist, and drew her to him as if he would not let her move from his side again. I followed a few steps behind, and should have entered the house had I not been recalled by the cabman, who ventured to remind me that he had not yet been paid.

I instantly put my hand into my pocket, only to have the fact recalled to me that I possessed no money at all. All my capital had gone to the bottom in the Fiji Princess, and I was absolutely penniless. The position was an embarrassing one, and I was just reflecting what I had better do, when I heard Mr. Maybourne come out into the verandah again. He must have divined my difficulty, for without hesitation he discharged the debt, and apologizing for not having thought of it, led me into the house.

Passing through an elegantly-furnished hall we entered the diningroom. Here breakfast was laid, and it was evidently from that meal that Mr. Maybourne had jumped up to re-

"Now, Mr. Wrexford," he cried, pointing to a chair, "sit yourself down yonder, and let me hear everything from the beginning to the end. Heaven knows I can hardly believe good fortune. Half an hour ago I was the most miserable man under the sun! now that I have got my darling back safe and sound, I believe I am the happiest."

"Had you then heard of the wreck of the 'Fiji Princess?' " I enquired. nothing has yet been heard of the vessel which was then more than a fortnight overdue. Agnes tells me that you were rescued by the King of Carthage. I understood she was expected about mid-day to-day, and I had resolved to visit her as soon as she got into dock, in order to enquire if they had any tidings to report regarding the lost vessel. How little I expected to find that you were safe on board her, Aggie! Mr. Wrexford, you can have no idea of the agony I have suffered this week past."

"On the contrary," I answered, "1 think I can very well imagine it." "And now tell me your story. I must not be cheated of a single detail." I saw from the way he looked at me that he expected me to do the narrating, so I did so, commencing with the striking of the vessel on the rock, and winding up with an account of our rescue by the King of Carthage.

He listened with rapt attention until

I had finished, and then turned to his daughter. "Has Mr. Wrexford told me everything?" he asked with a smile. "No," she answered. "He has not told you half enough. He has not told you that when I fell overboard one night, when we were off the Spanish coast, he sprang over after me and held me up until a boat came to our assistance. He has not told you that when the vessel sank he gave his own life-belt up to me, nor has he given you any idea of his constant kindness and self-sacrifice all through that leath cut him to the quick. After luncheon that day I found myself alone with Mr. Maybourne. I was not sorry for this, as I wanted to sound him as to my future movements. As I have so often said, I had no sort of desire to remain in Cape Town, and judged that the sooner I was up country, and out of civilization, the better it would be for me.

"You must forgive my being frank with you, Mr. Wrexford," said my host, as we lit cigars preparatory to drawing our chairs into the verandah; "but I have gathered from what you yourself have said and from what my daughter has told me, that you are visiting South Africa on the chance of obtaining some sort of employment. Is this so?" "That is exactly why I am here," said. "I am most anxious to find something to do as soon as possible." "In what direction will you seek it?" he asked. "What is your inclination? Remember, I may be able to help you." "I am not at all particular," I answered. "I have knocked about the world a good deal, and I can turn my hand to most things. But if a choice were permitted me, I fancy I should prefer mining of some sort to any-

"Indeed! I had no idea you understood that sort of work." "I have done a good deal of it," I replied, with a little touch of pride, for which next moment I found it difficult to account, considering the result to which it had brought me.

He asked one or two practical questions, which I was fortunately able to answer to his satisfaction, and then was silent for a couple of minutes or so. At last he consulted his pocket book, and then turned to me again. "I fancy, Mr. Wrexford," he said, "that you have come in the nick of time for both of us. We may be able to do each other mutual services." "I am very glad to hear that," I answered. "But in what possible way "Well, the matter stands like this," he said. "As you are doubtless aware, my business is mostly in connection with mining, both in this colony and its neighbors. Well, information has lately reached me concerning what promises to prove a first-class property in Mashonaland, eighty-five miles from Buluwayo. The mine has been excellently reported on, and is now being got into good going order. It only needs a capable manager at its head to do really well. Of course such a man is easily procured in a country where every man seems to be engaged in mining, more or less; and yet for that very self-same reason l am unable to make a selection. The available men all know too much, and I have private reasons for wishing this mine to be well looked after.

Now the question is, would you care

Needless to say, I embraced the opportunity in much the same manner as a hungry trout jumps at a fly. If I could only manage to get up there without being caught the appointment would suit me in every way. Mr. Maybourne seemed as pleased at my acceptance of it as I was at his offer; and when, after a little further conversation-in which I received many useful hints and no small amount of advice-it was revealed to his daughter, she struck me as being even more delighted than either her father or myself. I noticed that Mr. Maybourne looked at her rather anxiously for a moment as if he suspected there might be some sort of understanding between us, but whatever he may have thought he kept it to himself. He need, however, have had no fear on that score. Circumstances had placed an insurmountable barrier between myself and any thought of marriage with his daughter. As the result of our conversation, and at my special desire, it was arranged that I should start for my post on the following day. Nobody could have been more eager than was to be out in the wilds. But, with it all, my heart felt sad when I thought that after to-morrow I might never "Here is a telegram I received last | see the woman I so ardently loved night," he said handing me a paper | again. Since the previous night, when he had taken from his pocket. "You on the promenade-deck of the steamsee it is from Teneriffe, and says that er I had told her of my love, neither of us had referred in any way to the subject. So remote was the chance that I should ever be able to make her my wife that I determined so far as possible, to prevent myself from giving any thought to the idea. But I was not destined after all to leave without referring to the matter. That evening after dinner we were sitting in the verandah outside the drawing-room, when the butler came to inform Mr. Maybourne that a neighbor had called to see him. Asking us to excuse him for a few moments he left us and went into the house. When we were alone together I spoke to my companion of her father's kindnessfi and told her how much I appreciated it. She uttered a little sigh, and as this seemed an extraordinary answer to my speech, I enquired the reason of it.

"You say you are going away tomorrow," she answered, "and yet you ask me why I sigh! Cannot you over the ground we covered last night. It would be best not for both our sakes; you must see that yourself." "You know that I love you, and I know that you love me-and yet you can go away so calmly. What can
