A pretty woman is as often a fool as an Adonis is a fop. Beauty and brains are separate things, says a writer in Truth, and they hardly ever go together in women, because brains have a way of molding the features into strength. This is all very well in a man in whom strength is considered beauty, but in a woman it jars with our preconceived notions. In Greece, it seems, brains used to make a mold which was magnificently beautiful; it is not so in these days. We have a few curates with Greek profiles, a few beauties of the classic type, but one seldom hears of their possessing exceptional brains. If Darwin had been a woman letters would have appeared in the papers suggesting that women of science were dreadfully plain, no doubt because, being plain women, they took up science as a last resort. The idea that the size and formation of the brain forbade smooth, high brows and a small mouth would never have occurred to these

Helen of Troy was stupid; one cannot read her history without adoring her for the mixture of beauty and silliness which produced Homer, and, after many centuries, dipped Marlowe's pen in the divine fire. Mme. Recamier has been cited as an exception, but both her beauty and her brains have been questioned. On the whole, it seems that she was a very pretty and graceful woman, with exceptional charm, who studied the art of listening. Good manners are not difficult for a young girl to acquire, but it is difficult for the average young girl to realize their tremendous importance. The schoolgirl should try first to be considerate. In being that she will find nearly everything else will be comparatively easy. She will not talk in loud, breezy tones, because she will know that she is disturbing other persons; she will not hurry through the streets in a bold and pushing manner, nor stand in foolish, giggling groups on street corners, because she will know that she is making of herself a

Nor will she enter shops and engage in high pitched conversation, plentifully larded with unintelligible slang, incommoding other customers by blocking the counters.

If she will only accept consideration as a foundation and conscientiously begin her building, using quiet tones and soft colors, laying well polished stones of tact and grace one upon another, leaving out all that is harsh and unlovely, she will soon find herself possessed of a structure called a charming personality.

And once a young girl is safely housed within these walls she need never fear the lack of friends and popularity.
