Backache resulting from weak kidneys, a bad cold or other cause, usually renders the sufferer unfit for work and often results in permanent disability.

"I suffered for years with my back, or kidney trouble, and have tried a number of remedies from different physicians. More than a year ago, one of our local druggists induced me to try

Dr. Miles' Anti-Pain Pills and after using them some three months I found a decided improvement in my kidneys, and I am glad to say that I hope soon to be fully restored to health." J. P. ALLEN, HUNTING TRUFFLES.

In France They Train Dogs to Find the Prized Plants. Truffles, like mushrooms, belong to the family of the fungi, but are a distinct and very peculiar genus. They are cryptogamic plants and subterranean, their position underneath the soil varying from two to three inches to two feet in depth. They have no root, stem or leaf and vary in color from light brown to black. They are sometimes globular in form and vary in size from that of a pecan nut to that of a duck's egg. Their surface is watery and covered with a skin. Their exact method of growth is not precisely known. They are, of course, regarded as a great luxury by the epicure.

Truffles are mentioned by Juvenal, Pliny, Plutarch and Martial. The Athenian epicures were acquainted with them, and a story is told of a bon vivant who freed a whole family of slaves who had invented a delicious method of preparing them. France has the credit of producing the finest truffles. Dogs are commonly bred to search for them. The method of "breaking" these dogs is to give them for a time pieces are allowed to partake of any other food. After a certain period, when their appetite for truffles increases, pieces are hidden in the ground, and they are made to find them. Thus eighteen months before a dog becomes skilled in the art.

In some parts of France-Poitou and Perigord, for instance-pigs are trained for truffle hunting, and by some they are deemed to be better fitted for this work than dogs. - Harper's Weekly.

TOMBS OF LABRADOR. Tragedies Told In the Epitaphs of

Bleak Coast. It may be a senseless sentiment that makes a man crave to lie at last where his resting place may be the care of his friends. There are few things more pathetic than a grave in a foreign land; there are few disasters avoided with more unconsidered expense and trouble. Passing last year through the hitherto untracked forests of the northland, five hundred miles above Toronto and within a quarter of truffles every morning before they of that distance of James Bay, the sight of a lonely slab and rude picket fence threw a damper over the jolly journalists of the first passenger train that had ever rumbled over the line, says W. Lacy Amy in Toronto Saturday Night. But away up-or down, as they are gradually taught their busi the Newfoundlander calls it-along the ness, though it often takes as long as | bleak, barren, storm-swept east coast of Labrador, the grave is lonelier and more pathetic; the rough fence to keep | the money required for transportation

But now and then the dread white plague or one of the many dangers of the north snuff out a life before the dying wish can be gratified. And there he must be buried, in one of the two or three graveyards of the thousand-mile coast if posible, and if that cannot be, in any spot where enough soil to turn over has settled among the endless rocks of the coast. It is at Cartwright, one of the leading ports of Labrador, and one of the officials. And this spot is one of the sights of Labrador. In it stands a low, square tombstone to the memory of the man who made Labrador possible, and who handed down to the world a history that is the most complete yet published of life in Labrador, and with all its hundred and forty years of age, still stands a model of detailed description of life and conditions. The graveyard crowns a hill a half-mile from the wharf, and the path to it is well-tracked and tended. The fence is the most imposing in all Labrador, an expense that is justified around such a man's grave. It made no difference that the memory of the conduct of Cartwright as revealed in his own writings was not of to embarrass him.
