CHAPTER XX.

Judge Lawless was in a rage! If you have ever seen an angry lion, an enraged bear, or a young lady when "her mantle pinned awry," you may conceive in some measure the state of mind in which that gentleman trod up and down his library floor, while he listened to Ranty's account of Pet's exploit the previous night. Judge Lawless was a man of forty or so, and had been a widower for five years. His face was not particularly prepossessing, though extremely handsome; his haughty, supercilious expression, his cold, and somewhat sinister eyes, and slightly sensual mouth, were, on the whole, rather repelling. He prided himself, as a general thing, on his gentlemanly urbanity; but on the present occasion he quite forgot all his customary politeness, and paced up and

His son and heir, Master Ranty, had ensconced himself in a velvet cushioned easy chair; and with his feet on a stool, and both hands stuck in his coat pockets, took things very coolly indeed.

"To think that my daughter should act in such an outrageous manner! exclaimed the Judge, passionately "making herself a town's talk with her mad actions. What other young lady in her station of life would associate familiarly with those people at Dismal Hollow, who are a low set, as far as I understand; or ride through those infested woods after night. I shall put an immediate stop to it, if I have to lock her up in the attic on bread and water, I have good mind to keep her on bread and water for a month or so, and see if that will not cool the fever in her blood! And you sir," he added, stopping in his excited walk, and turning furiously upon Ranty, "deserve a sound thrashing for playing dignantly. such a trick upon your sister.

"Well," said the disrespectful vixen, "if he's a mind to get mad for nothing, I can't help it. I sha'n't go."

"O Pet ! you'd better," said Erminie, anxiously. "He'll be so angry. I can take care of Ray, you know; and your father will scold you

"La! I know that! I'm in for scolding, any way, so I may as well earn it. Might as well be hung for a sheep as a lamb, you know."

"O Pet! don't stand bothering here all day," broke in Ranty, impatient ly. "I've got to bring you home, don't come right straight along. "Yes; go Pet-please do," pleaded Erminie. "I had rather you would." "Oh well, if I'm to be turned out I suppose I must," said Pet, taking her hat. "I'm ready. Good-bye Minnie, I'll be back after dinner." "I don't know about that," mut tered Ranty, springing into the saddle. "People ain't got out of attics so easily as you think." A rapid gallop of half-an-hour brought them to Heath Hill, a gent ly-sloping eminence, on which stood an imposing mansion of gray sandstone, the aristocratic home of Judge Lawless, the one great potentate of Judestown and environs. The judge, from the window of the library, saw his son and daughter approach, and flinging himself into the lounging chair Ranty had vacated, he rang the bell and ordered the servant who answered his summons to send Miss Petronilla up-stairs di-
