Organs, Pianos, Sewing Machines
One or other of these should find a place in every home, and it isn't my fault that they do not. I make the prices low enough, goodness knows.
Bell Pianos and Organs and the Karn Piano are instruments of well known reputation, and thousands of them are to be found in the refined homes of Ontario, including Lindsay and vicinity. What more suitable gift could a mother or father make—always a realizable asset, always a delight to the owner, and contributing to the pleasure of others.
The Busy Mother of the Household who perhaps does not receive the full consideration she merits—what for her? Let us suggest one of our high-class Sewing Machines.

but, by nature not being vicious and low, the influences were not hopelessly degrading. To his mother he was a character. To his father he was a boy, better than all the other sons in the world. She believed in him. He worshipped her, and it was not until he was well up in the twenties that she stopped to think that she was not the only good woman in the world who deserved respect.

Up in Albany lived the Widow Coleman and her two pretty daughters. Mrs. Coleman's husband died on the battlefield, and she, like many women in the north and south, after years of moderate prosperity was compelled to support herself and her family. She had been a pretty woman, and one readily could see where her daughters got their personal attractiveness.

Not many doors from the boisterous little eating house in which the railroad men snatched their meals as they went through, the widow opened a book and news stand. Her home was on the floor above the stand, and it was there she brought her little girls to womanhood. Good looking, hurm, hurm! One evening as he dropped in to purchase a new paper, it was at the end of June, in 1876, and the country was in the throes of excitement over the first news of the Custer massacre on the Little Big Horn river.

Cable was deeply interested, for he had seen Custer fighting at the front in the sixties. Frances Coleman, the prettiest girl he had ever seen, sold him the newspaper. After that, he seldom went through Albany without visiting the little book shop.

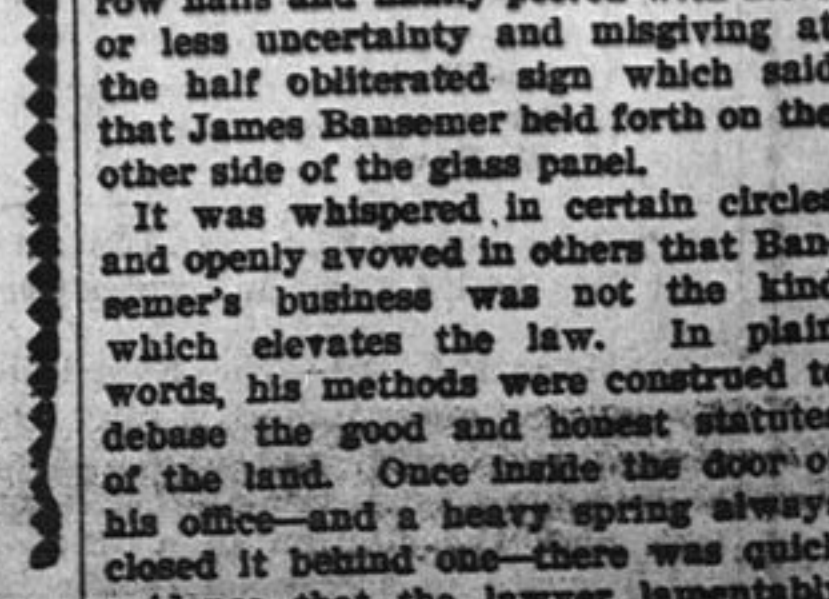

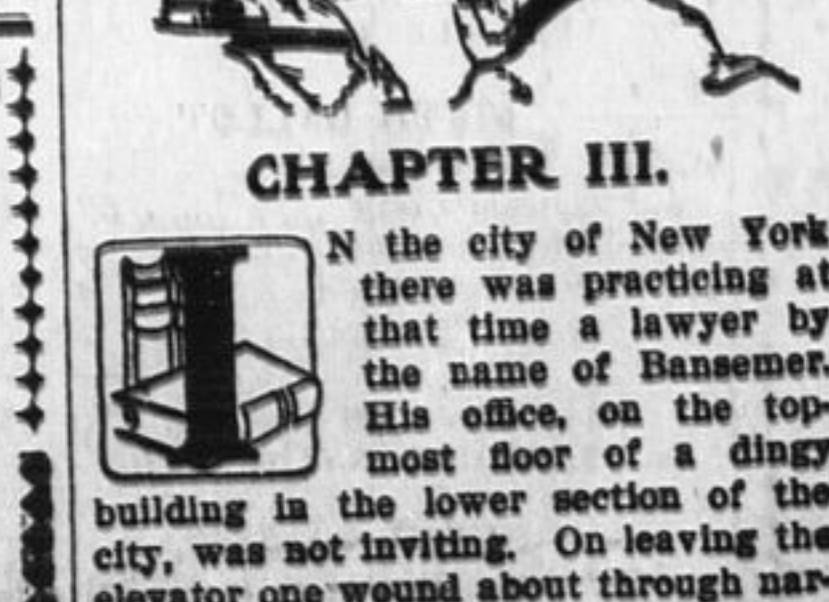

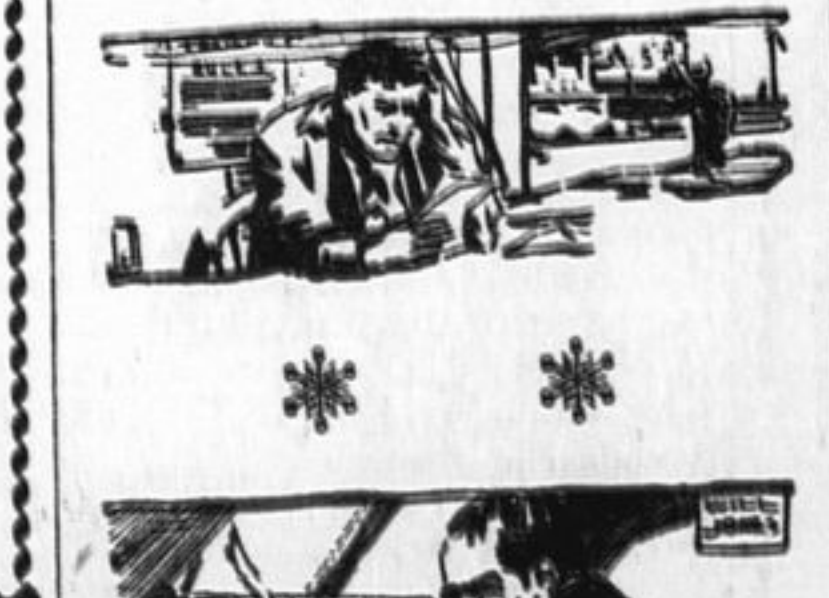

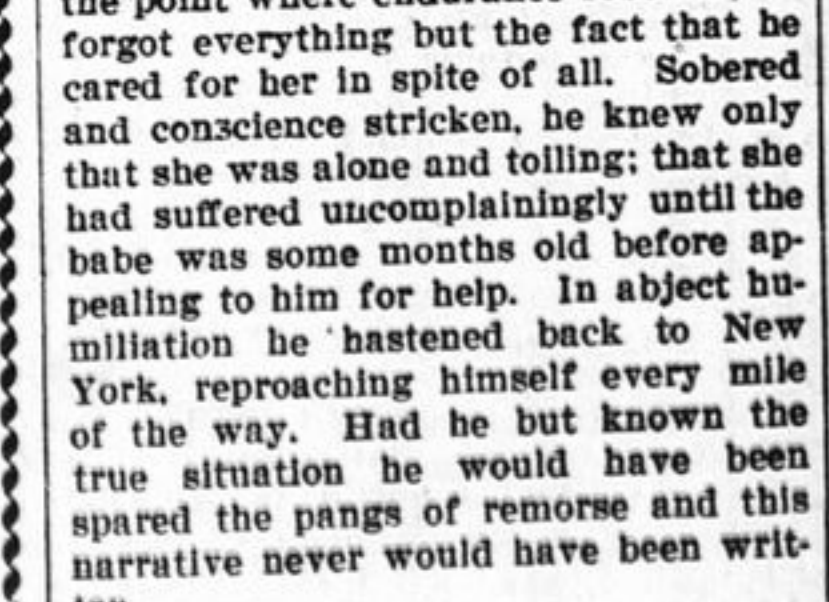

Temporarily, even aroused in love, Cable, once convinced that he cared for her, lost no time in claiming her, whether or no. In less than three months after the Custer massacre they were married.

Defeated rivals unanimously and enviously observed that the handsomest freeman on the road had conquered the most outrageous little coquette between New York and Buffalo. As a matter of fact, she had loved him from the start; the others served as thorns with which she delightedly pricked his heart into submission.

The young husband and his bride, renounced all of his undesirable habits and became a new man with such surprising suddenness that his friends marveled and derided. A new happiness followed. He grew accustomed to her frivolous ways, overlooked her merry whimsicalities and gave her the "full length of a free rope" as he called it. He was contented and consequently careless. She chafed under the indifference and in her resentment believed the worst of him.

Turned out peace and contentment, and in the end David Cable, driven to distraction, weakly abandoned the domestic battlefield and fled to the far west, giving up home, goods and all for the sake of freedom, wages and a new life. He ignored her letters and entreaties, but in all those months that he was away from her he never ceased to regret the impulse that had defeated him. Nevertheless he could not make up his mind to go back and resume the life of torture her jealousy had begotten.

Then the unexpected happened. A letter was received containing the command to come home and care for his wife and baby. At once David Cable called a halt in his demoralizing career and saw the situation plainly. He forgot that she had "singed" him to the point where endurance rebelled; he forgot everything but the fact that he cared for her in spite of all. Sobered and conscience-stricken, he knew only that she was alone and toiling; that she had suffered uncomplainingly until the babe was some months old before appealing to him for help. In abject humiliation he hastened back to New York, reproaching himself every mile of the way. Had he not known the true situation he would have been spared the pangs of remorse and this narrative never would have been written.

disregarded the virtues of prosperity, no matter how they had been courted and won. As though his transactions in and out of the courts of that great city bore the mark of dishonor, he looked to be less than five feet over all.

The men had been classmates in an obscure law school down in Pennsylvania. Bansemmer, while Droom was forceful and young, where he came distinctly his opposite and no one cared for no one thirty-five when he entered the school, at least twelve years the senior of Bansemmer.

His appearance and attire proclaimed him to be from the country, but his aplomb, his knowledge of the world and his wonderful insight into human nature contradicted his looks immensurably. A conflict of two convictions was known to have made money during the ten years of his career as a member of the bar.

Possibly he kept his office shabby and unclean that it might be in touch with the transactions which had their morbid birth inside the grayer walls. There was no spot or corner in the two small rooms that comprised his "chambers" to which he could point with pride. The floors were greasy with papers; with malodorous notations, documents and pictures; the windows were smoky and useless; the desk bore every suggestion of disquietude.

But little less appalling to the senses, this seamy was the clerk himself. Squatting behind his wretched desk, Elias Droom peered across the litter of papers and books with shabby but polite eyes, almost as inviting as the spider who with wily but insidious decorum draws the gullest into his web.

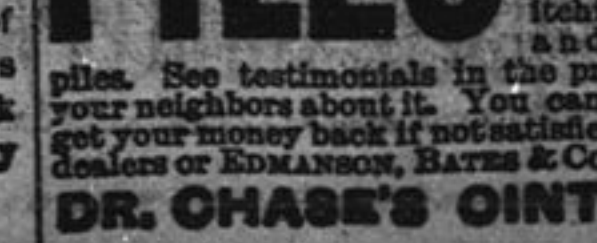

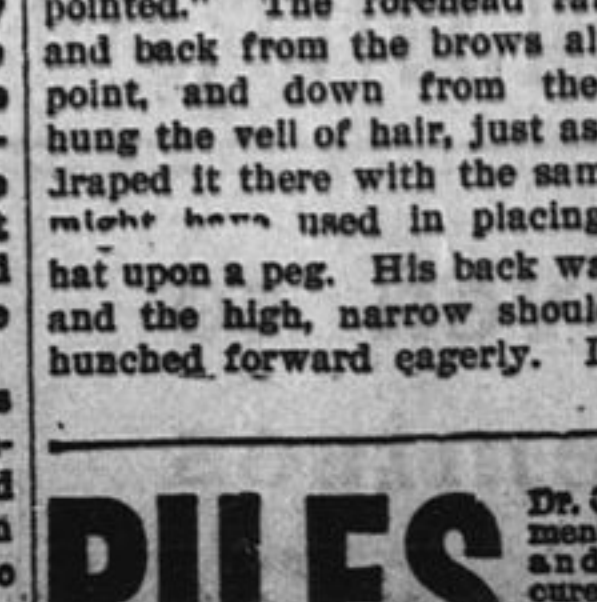

If one passed muster in the estimation of the incomprehensible Droom he was permitted in due season to pass through a second oppressive looking door and into the private office of Mr. Droom and James Bansemmer, attorney at law and solicitor. It may be remarked at this early stage that, no matter how long or how well one may have known Droom, one seldom lingered to engage in commonplaces with him. His was the most repellent personality imaginable. When he smiled one was conscious of a shock to the nervous system; when he so far forgot to smile to laugh aloud there was a distinct illustration of the word "crunching"; when he spoke one was almost sorry that he had done so.

Bansemmer knew but little of this fresh individual's history; no one else had the temerity to inquire into his past or to separate it from his future, for that matter. Once Bansemmer ironically asked him why he had never married. It was a full minute before the other lifted his eyes from the sheet of legal cap, and by that time he was in full control of his passion.

"Look at me! Would any woman marry a thing like me?" This was said with such terrible earnestness that Bansemmer took care never to broach the subject again. He saw that Droom's heart was not all steel and brass.

Droom was middle aged. His lank body and cadaverous face were constructed on principles not generally accredited to nature as it applies to men. When erect his body swayed as if it were a stubborn reed determined to maintain its dignity in the face of the wind. He did not walk; he glided. His long, square chin, rarely clean shaven, protruded far beyond its natural orbit. Indeed, the attitude of the chin gave one an insight to the greedy character of the man. At first glance one felt that Droom was reaching forth with his lower jaw to give greeting with his teeth instead of his hand.

His neck was long and thin, and his turndown collar was at least two sizes too large. The nose was hooked and of abnormal length, the tip coming down over the short upper lip and broad mouth. His eyes were light blue and so intense that he was never known to blink the lashes. Topping them were deep, wavering black eyebrows that met above the nose, forming an ominous, cloudy line across the base of his thin, high forehead. The crown of his head, covered by long

HOW TO POP CORN.
It is done in different ways, but the most approved method is to pop your corns with Putnam's Corn Extract—corns pop out fair, and stay out too when removed by Putnam's. Try this painless remedy yourself.
SOME GOOD ADVICE.
Ask for what you want, and ask emphatically. Do so through The Warder's want columns. If you want an employer or an employee you can find him in a hurry if you take this course. The Warder will tell you your wants to thousands of people as quickly as you can tell them personally to a dozen people. You can't afford the slow way.
NEW REGULATIONS.
The G.T.R. has issued a circular to conductors and brakemen, instructing them not to allow on trains persons afflicted with a contagious disease. The circular also says: "Particular attention is called to the desire to discourage the habit of expectorating in public places. It is the conductor's duty to point out to the offender that he is breaking the law. It is also the conductor's duty to inform the offender that if the offense is repeated that he is liable to a fine of $20 and costs."

WILL OPEN MARCH 8.
Mr. Frank Forbert, formerly of Lindsay, but now of Woodville, intends moving back to town next week and opening up a boot, shoe and men's furnishing store at the foot of Kent-st. in the premises now occupied by Miss K. Tangney. Mr. Forbert's oldest son, Albert, who is now employed with Gough Bros., Toronto, will join the new firm, which will be known as Forbert & Son. The store will be remodelled and made into an up-to-date boot, shoe and men's furnishing store. They expect to open about March 8th.
SHOWED RYE IN THE WHEAT.
Woodstock, Feb. 17.—The conclusion of a most remarkable case was seen in the police office this afternoon when W. S. West, solicitor, paid into court the sum of $45.65 on behalf of his clients, Herman Beare and Thomas Howard. Beare and Howard were found guilty over a week ago of sowing rye in Wm. Forbert's wheat fields in Blenheim township, and they were invited to pay $25 to partially repay Forbert for the damage done, as well as the costs, amounting to $18.65. This having been done, the young men were allowed to go on suspended sentence. The case was the first of its kind to come before the local courts. It was charged that Beare and Howard were found guilty, deliberately sowing rye through the wheat, damaging the crop in the opinion of Mr. Forbert to the extent of $90. Howard pleaded guilty, and told how he and Beare went to one of the fields after midnight, and he said that he walked around with Beare, while the latter carried the bag of rye and distributed it over the ground. Beare is the son of a farmer in Blenheim, and Howard is a farm laborer, who was employed by Beare's father at the time the offence was committed last fall.
