Here is a little churchyard in the very heart of the city which illutrates the truth of this statement. Perhaps ten minutes' walk from the Terrace, up St. John street, which is ancient fortifications, stands a stom church in Gothic style so generally adopted by the Church of England One wall of the building stands close to the street, and the notice board at the main entrance announces that it is St. Matthew's Church.

Close to the gateway and not more than a couple of feet from the wall separating the churchyard from the street, is a weather-stained slab of grey limestone somewhat less than four feet in height, and shaped at the top into a Gothic arch. The stone stands firm and erect, and although its inscription is well-worn, it can still with a little care be wholly read. It is in these words:
