In the former case, the seed is grown from selected plants-from roots which have an ideal size and form and are known to

For instance, an ideal turnip is one having a small neck, and top growth. Such a root when planted will produce a comparatively small growth of stalks, and consequently a small amount of seed, but the seed from such a root is apt to produce a crop like the mother root I have everything you require. which was planted. On the other. hand a small turnip having several , root prongs, and an excessive growth of top coming from two or three seperate neck growths, will transmit thing you require for House or its like through the seed to the next crop. Seed can be grown from such right. The best workmen, the roots more cheaply than from selected roots, because, in the first place the mother rokts are culls, and are not as valuable for feeding, and secondly, they will produce a much larger quantity of seed.

During the last ten or fifteen years the seed trade has, to a great extent, been passing from the hands of seedsmen who devote their time to a study of seeds and the seed trade, into the hands of local dealers Unfortunately, fair competition in the seed trade, is practically impossible, since the appearance of most commercial seeds is but a slight indication of their real value. The competition has been, and is too largely confined to prices alone. Farmers continue to patronize the local dealer who is able to quote a low price for his goods. The local dealer demands a low priced seed of the wholesale firms, and in turn there has been a growing strife among wholesale and seed firms in the buying of cheap goods, with which to supply local dealers. It is well to mention, however, that through the progressive spirit of some reliable seed houses a limited trade of the best stocks of root crops seeds fostered, and there is little difficulty experienced among intelligent farmers, in getting the best quality of seeds provided that they go the right way about it, and are willing to pay a commensurate price.
