COL. HUGHES JUSTIFIED

Our readers will see how they are wholly unfounded. Col. Hughes was right. Gen. Hutton was wrong.

ABOUT THE APOLOGY

Col. Hughes apologized for his language before leaving for Africa. He wrote Gen. Hutton on Oct. 27 as follows: "I desire to make full and ample apology to you for certain letters written by me to you during recent months, letters written under deep excitement caused by the belief that I was to be debarred from participating in the deeds of a Canadian contingent in the Imperial service should one be sent to the Transvaal, a project which I as the proposer for many years, felt deeply at heart."

News of the Week

A Hamilton conductor named Harper was blacklisted by the grocer because he failed to pay a bill of $7.58. He sued the association for libel.

The Indian girls on the Mohawk reserve, named Eliza and Mary Ann Culbertson, claim as their property the land on which the town of Deseronto, Ont., now stands, which is worth probably two or three million dollars.

"Be good enough to ask the General Officer Commanding to furnish me with the date of the full and complete apology which Lieutenant Colonel Sam. Hughes has written; and also, with a copy of the same."

That made the General confess that it was the same apology that he had refused before Col. Hughes left, and dated away back Oct. 27. It just meant that he had brought to time and was caught trying to make it appear that he had received another apology from Col. Hughes. So then even the apology incident is discreditable to Gen. Hutton. Col. Hughes was right; Gen. Hutton was wrong.

A NEW THEORY ABOUT ENSILAGE

It Should be Made of Corn Cut When the Cob is Setting.

Those who have taken their information from speakers at various agricultural meetings or from the leading works on the subject, suppose that the time to cut corn for silage is when the glazing begins. A writer in the Country Gentleman sets forth a different theory in the following way: "First, why do we put corn into a silo? Is it not for the purpose of giving the animal a fresh green fodder that is as near as may be to the fresh green grass? I think that no one will disagree with me that green fresh grass for the main ration is the best of anything that a cow can be fed for producing milk and keeping in good health. Corn, when it has matured to the stage when nature puts in her energy to produce the seed, is as near good grass as can be found. As Dr. Bailey, the apostle of ensilage says—'Green corn is a large grass.'"

Why do we put it in a silo? I suppose to preserve it in its natural green condition as much as possible. I think that at no time it is in better condition than when the ear begins to put forth to produce the seed. The stalk and leaves must deteriorate by assisting to produce the seed. The soil or the plant must be drawn on to mature the ear—no matter which, it costs something to produce that ear. I think it is universally admitted that it is not good policy to let grass stand to produce the seed. I think no good farmer at the present day will let his timothy or clover stand till the seed is ripe before he cuts it to put it in his barns for feeding his animals. Then why mature the corn ear?

In the second place, I would not put in the ears even if matured; I would break them off and feed separately. In 1893, I filled the Bailey silos (the doctor died that year). I had been with the doctor about three years on his farm, and was familiar with the way he managed; and when the manager of Clouland Farm was filling the silos, I was about and noted how he did it. The corn was not glazed. The frosts began to show, and they were compelled to cut it when the ears were good roasting ears—some not as full as that and some a little glazed. It was well put in, but it had to be elevated some 25 feet. Men were kept in the silo to spread and tramp it down, but I noticed the cut ears, being heavier, dropped directly under the conducting trough, and with the best the men could do, there was more corn in that section than in any other part of the silo. Some were richer in corn than others; it cannot be otherwise. Again, I have watched the feeding and I am satisfied that in the distribution to the herd, the rations are not even in richness. It is not just to expect the feeding man can feed some 30 cows and give an equal ration of this ensilage; the variation will be considerable. For that reason I should prefer to have the ear separate, so each cow would get the same quality, and in feeding the corn or meal, justice could be done to each. Then there need be no guess-work about it."
