be kept replenished by the excise duty on spirits, and their burdens were so great and their relief so distant that they naturally took to drink to drown their sorrows. But even then they were considered one of the most light-hearted people in Europe. There are a hundred, other conditions that might be mentioned to keep the poor of Ireland in misery did space permit or the occasion call for their recital. In the north the Catholic Irish were continually assailed to keep them from getting hold of the land.

Within my time the first great grievance attempted to be remedied was that of the imposition of tithes, which were shifted from the tenants to the landlords, who, however, re-imposed them by increasing the rents when opportunity offered.

The sanitary and domestic affairs were nearly as bad, I suppose, in England as they were in Ireland, as British Governments in those days were neither scientific nor domestic, statesmen being taken up so much with wars and conquests; and being chosen from the landed gentry, who were everything before Sir Robert Peel's time, they had no idea of scientific Government nor of political economy.

The repeal of the corn laws gave Ireland a very black eye. English legislation had destroyed Ireland's once flourishing manufacturers before the union, and Ireland, having dropped to an exclusively agricultural state, this ruined her grain-growing interests, and the holding of land became less profitable. It was a good thing for the English working classes, but a poor thing for the Irish people, who were not considered in the transaction, although Daniel O'Connor, their leader, became a free trader. This, I suppose, he did to get the support of the free traders for the Irish cause.

The electoral franchise in Ireland was then very limited, and was made more so by disfranchising "the forty-shilling freeholders" in exchange for Catholic emancipation. The Tory landlords, having all their own way, were able to carry even the most Catholic and Liberal constituencies, and for a long time no Catholic was eligible for membership in Parliament. And it was a good while after emancipation was granted before the Catholics were able to muster a fair representation, and that after repeated struggles and failures. Thomas Wyse, who was elected member of Parliament for Waterford, succeeded after a while in getting a modicum of school facilities for Ireland, but the commissioners seemed to delight in making the rules and conditions as un- Irish as they could. Even Sir Walter Scott's poem, "Hall, Caledonia, Stern and Wild," had "Breathes there a man with soul so dead" stricken out of it, in a volume of poetry published, by the commissioners for fear it might infect the Irish. The schools established by the Government were called "national schools," when in fact they were anti-national as ingenuity could make them. Nothing was done to conform to Irish ideas.

The means of subsistence was the potato and oatmeal, the cheapest products that could be produced. It never entered the craniums of statesmen or scientists that these might give out some time. But they did, and, strange to say, the calamity that bore so hard on the Irish was a benefit to the English, because it compelled Sir Robert Peel, the Prime Minister, to repeal the corn law protection act, and allow foreign grain to be admitted to England free of duty, for the benefit of the English working classes. The governing classes of England had no regard for the welfare of the Irish, and the Irish believed they would gladly see them rot. And they did rot, and starve and die. The greatest famine the British Isles ever saw set in and it brought fever and distress in its train in 1846-47, so that in flying from it the Irish brought the epidemic to our own shores, causing death and devastation here. Lord John Russell, who was considered a wise and liberal statesman, was then Premier, but he put the laws of political economy before the laws of humanity and said the course of trade could not be interfered with. The Government did nothing to avert so great a calamity, as a Government, although English charity contributed munificently to relieve the appalling distress. Yet, remember, there was plenty in the land to feed the people in wheat and oats and barley; but those commodities were seized by the landlords to pay their rents. Nobody will believe, if Ireland had her own Parliament in that terrible crisis, a life need not have been lost nor a soul left to perish of an epidemic.

The lesson was a terrible one, and the young men of Ireland talked rebellion. Sedition was promulgated and many thought it better to die fighting than to die starving. Then another blight of union rule came upon the country. Hundreds of the best and bravest were driven into exile and penal servitude; men who would adorn a Senate by their talents, as some of them afterwards actually did, were prosecuted for treason-felony, and were lost to their country and were sent into exile.

What did Ireland get afterwards for this wrong and this sacrifice? An act for the benefit of the Irish landlords--the encumbered estates act, which enabled the landlords to sell estates encumbered with debt from the previous extravagance of their DOCTORS USING PATENT MEDICINES The Honest Physician is Anxious to Cure and Uses the Best Available Remedies. The proposed legislation through the Dominion Parliament for the regulation of the manufacture and sale of patent or proprietary medicines is of the utmost importance, and it is receiving a great deal of attention, not only by the proprietary medicine manufacturers, but also by the leading doctors and druggists. Every manufacturer of reliable and high class remedies welcomes the bill as a step in the right direction. The discussion has brought out the fact that the best physicians in Canada and on the continent approve of and prescribe Psychine in cases of the most difficult character. In a recent instance of very serious throat and lung trouble the patient had been using Psychine. Two leading United States specialists were consulted, in addition to two eminent Canadian physicians. Upon learning what the patient was using, a sample of Psychine was taken and analysed, with the result that the physicians advised its continuance. They prescribed no other medicine but Psychine, with the result that the patient has fully recovered and is a splendid walking and talking advertisement for the wonderful curative power of a remedy that will "stand up" before the keenest professional criticism and analysis. As a builder up of the system and restorer of all wasted conditions, Psychine has no equal, and the best and most earnest physicians recognize this fact.

Home Rule for Ireland

The Struggle of a Century for Political Rights as Viewed by an Irishman.

For the length of a lifetime the writer of this has been a student of the Irish question, with his sympathies for the Irish people. In Daniel O'Connell's time he read O'Connell's and Shiel's speeches and learned of some of the grievances the Irish people were laboring under then. He was born and brought up among them and knew there was little or no exaggeration in what those great orators stated. O'Connell, however,

Commons, when he defended the Irish by asking Lord Lyndhurst to "go ask Arthur Duke of Wellington if their blood or their religion kept them from fighting for the empire, and gave him an army of Irishmen in the Peninsula which was not surpassed in the history of the world for bravery, and overthrew the legions of the great Napoleon in many a battle." So there was during O'Connell's time a racial as well as a political warfare carried on between the two peoples, and when the Irish reapers went over to England in the harvest time they were often chased and driven away by the English workmen, and it was difficult for the poor Irish who sought employment in the cities to get it because of the prejudices that prevailed against them, and "no Irish need apply" was invariably found at the end of every "want" advertisement in The London Times and other English newspapers. The lot of the Irish people during William's and the beginning of Queen Victoria's reigns was very bad. Bad government in their domestic affairs put them at a great disadvantage. They were ignorant because the Government begrudged them educational facilities; they were impoverished because they had to pay exorbitant rents to landlords and church tithes to the ministers of a Church they did not believe in. There were no sanitary conditions existing to safeguard the health of the people, and many farmhouses were insanitary asylums, as there were no public places for demented people. They were encouraged to become drunkards that the coffers of the Government might
