ARMITAGE'S PROOF

But it is not wise for you to sit up very long," declared Miss Noyette.

"Not wise at all, sir!" said Armitage.

"It would be worse, sir, if you were to retard your recovery by writing in those books," pointing to those he had asked to have brought to his bedside.

"It is Sunday!" added Miss Noyette.

"I don't know, but I have done—and nothing more to do but think, think, all day long."

"I must resign myself to the inevitable, and stay on my downy couch all the afternoon?"

"There is a little change possible in your position, if you are really so anxious to test your strength."

"What visitors?"

"I do not seem overjoyed at her proposal," the voice betokened disappointment.

"I would have been so much better off had she permitted him to adjust some of his ledger items, long neglected by his enforced lodgment in the hospital, and necessary of completion if he would straighten out financial matters before leaving the institution."

"I shall expect you to be here when time is up."

"I trust so; certainly it could not have fallen on more desolate soil, could it, Miss Noyette?"

"I should like to see it wither away—then I cannot see it wither."

dream. Visitors' Day, Miss Noyette had told him. But he would have no visit from any member of his family; their lives were apart from his.

There were all sorts and conditions of them and he finally became keenly interested in counting them, and in speculating upon their errands.

super than some hard hearted nurses do."

"It must have been Deborah Veltner," exclaimed Miss Noyette.

"Thank you," murmured Armitage, with that quiet reserve of manner that always forbade his nurse saying more.
