A great many people from smaller towns of this province make periodical visits to Toronto, and while there, make certain observations which would reather startle the regular inhabitants of that city. These conclusions would be simply amusing were it not that the observers base their future conduct on them, to the detriment of home towns. For instance, a visit to the large departmental stores leads the visitor to the conclusion that these firms buy in such enormous quantities that they can afford to sell at a lower price than the merchants in the smaller places. Without looking further into matter they purchase as much possible while in the city, and order visits.
