- Pure Paris Green at Cinnamon's.
- Ald. Robinson last week erected a fine new windmill on his farm in Emily. He is pasturing the farm, and can take in a limited number of cattle besides his own. Prices: colts from $1 to $1.50, according to age; cattle, yearlings, 50c, 2 year-olds 75c and cows $1. The pasture is first-class, and the new windmill insures plenty of water.—26-4.
- The Flaville Milling Company's picnic at Sturgeon Point on the 25th promises to sustain the high reputation of that annual outing. Arrangements have been made for the Kenosha to make two trips, and the Alexandria and barge one, so that there will be plenty of boat room for all who want to go. That very popular feature of the picnic, giving every child attending a prize, will be adhered to this season. The program of sports at the Point will afford a capital day's sport. With good weather, this picnic will certainly be one of the biggest outings of the season.
- Washing Machines and Wringers at Cinnamon's.
- On Monday night of last week a bad smash-up occurred when the people were going home from the entertainment at Zion Methodist church, Fenelon. When Mr. J. Moynes was driving down the steep hill west of the church, his team became unmanageable and dashed into Mr. Murchison's rig in which were himself, wife and six children and Rev. Mr. Ferguson, Presbyterian minister at Glenora. The shock broke the neck of Mr. Murchison's rig and let the carriage onto his horse. The rig was upset. The occupants escaped miraculously with only a few bruises.
- At a meeting of committees on Tuesday night, Ald. O'Reilly's coming machines. The secrecy with which so many inventors surround their experiments is usually due not alone to the desire to be sensational, but quite as much to the fact that they cannot get a patent on their inventions, and thus protect them against ruinous imitation. The Patent Act requires that an invention be really an invention, i.e., that it be new and useful. To be of use, it would seem a flying machine must be able to fly. In the case of any ordinary mechanism, it suffices to make a series of drawings to file with the specification, the principles involved being so familiar that any one skilled in the art to which the device belongs could produce a specimen from the patterns and descriptions, and would know in advance that it would work. Not so with the flying machine, which has so far defied the brightest wits that have been trained on it. There never was an inventor of a flying machine who did not "know" that it would work. But, on the other hand, there is at Ottawa no model that has ever borne out its claims.

Roller Boats Roll Not.
The same way with the roller boats. Tens of thousands of dollars have been spent on the effort to make the boat "roll." And roll it did—usually in a totally unexpected direction. There have been half a dozen inventors of roller boats, at least one of whom has spent his entire fortune in striving after the seemingly impossible. The flying machine presents even more difficulties. When the application for permission to submit plans and specifications is made, the Patent Office blandly and patiently answers that, by all means, the gentleman may send in his descriptions of the flying machine. Of course, the Patent Office believes that the gentleman is going to score a failure, but that is not the business of the Patent Office. If the gentleman—as has been done once or twice—asserts that he has a full-sized machine that will fly, he is asked to bring forward the testimony of persons who have seen it fly.

Maxim's Machine.
Probably the man who has made, next to Santos Dumont, the best effort at solving the problem of human flight, is Sir Hiram Maxim, the gun inventor. He built a huge aeroplane which was propelled by a powerful steam engine, and which ran between upper and lower rails. It demonstrated the ability of a self-propelled aeroplane to elevate itself, but was not regarded as a successful flying machine, because it could not run long enough. The engine required so much water that it could not carry the weight of fuel necessary for sustained flight. Sir Hiram Maxim never allowed his machine to soar away from the rails that held it in subjection for fear it would run out of fuel and come to earth with a crash, for no means had been discovered to keep it in control. The fuel difficulty may, of course, be settled by the use of gasoline. Still, the way out is not yet clear.

There has just come to light in Bristol, England, an interesting romance of a picture. For some years there has been hanging in the Bristol Young Men's Christian Association a picture entitled "The Holy Family." The owner lent it for a long time, and on one occasion, the association should buy it. He did not wish to drive a hard bargain. The picture was obviously a good one: it was six feet by four and a half feet. Would the committee like to buy it for £10? "If you would," he said, "I am so much in sympathy with your excellent work that I am willing to contribute £5 myself toward the purchase money." But the committee felt that they had more important demands for their £5 notes, and they replied accordingly. By and by the owner died, and the executors began to realize his estate. The picture was looked up and the work was ordered to be packed and sent to London for sale. Judge the satisfaction of the executors when they received an offer of £7,000 for it, and were advised not to sell under £10,000. Experts have identified the picture as from the brush of Pietro de Cortona, the great Italian painter of the early seventeenth century.

Men of the Day.
The Right Hon. Andrew Graham Murray, Lord Advocate for Scotland, who has been appointed to preside over the Royal Commission which is to consider the law affecting trades unions and the relations of capital and labor, is a very eminent Scottish lawyer.

Sir William Lewis, who will also serve on the commission, is a Welsh coal magnate, and the inventor of the sliding scale of payment for coal-getting. He was born at Merthyr Tydvil in 1837, and has served on several previous Royal Commissions on labor and coal-mining.

Mr. Arthur Cohen, K.C., owes his nomination to the commission to his highly specialized knowledge of trade union law. He is now Judge of the Cinque Ports and has a son at the Bar.

GENIUS AND THE TAVERN.
Association Between Authors and Houses That Entertain—Famous Men Made Them Celebrated in Days of Yore.
Houses of entertainment have always provided the haunts, and occasionally the homes, of men prominent in literature and the arts; and if, as a rule, innkeepers themselves and their families have been undistinguished, there are some notable exceptions, says The London Standard. Chaucer's host of the Tabard was a man of affairs and became a member of the House of Commons; and in our own day Irish Nationalism has reintroduced the publican Parliamentarian. In James J. time, just as now, for John Taylor, who kept a tavern, for John Taylor, the Water Poet, a man of considerable literary gifts though of little culture, was landlord of the Poet's Head, in Phoenix Alley, Long-acre and published many of his effusions from the house. Mat Prior, poet and Ambassador, at one time helped his uncle in the bar of the Rhenish Wine House, Channel Row, the Earl of Dorset and the Dean of Westminster being among the frequenters.

Dr. Johnson said of Prior that "in his private relaxation he revived the tavern" and this harsh judgment pointed to the orgies at the house in Long-acre kept by Bessie Cox, the Chloe of his amorous songs. It was also in Long-acre at his father's public house, that Thomas Stothard, R. A., was born. A more famous artist, Sir Thomas Lawrence, P.R.A., was also a son of the tavern, and at the Black Bear, Devon-st., he was shown as an infant prodigy, either reciting verses or drawing portraits. George Morland spent most of his time at inns such as the Cabin, Freshwater, the Mother Black Cap, Pleasing Passage, and the White Lion, Paddington, where he kept a regular establishment. Hogarth exhibits the interior of the old Hummums in the "Modern Midnight Conversation," and the exterior of the Adam and Eve in the "March of Finchley," while his own "Five Days' Frolic" was simply a tavern tour from Billingsgate, by Gravesend and Queensborough, to Covent Garden.

Romney had a studio at the Holy Bush, Hampstead, and Kneller painted the portraits of the Kit-Kat Club at the Fountain Tavern, Fountain Court, Strand, where Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, as a child, long time, and honorary member, and made a toast: "Perhaps the only barnard to attain literary immortality was 'Sweet Molly Mogg, of the Rose,' whose praises were jointly sung by Pope, Swift, and Gay, in a once-popular ballad, and whose death, fifty years afterwards, was chronicled in the Gentleman's Magazine.

The tavern club dates from the Elizabethan era. The Bear's Head only disappeared in 1831. At the Marmad in Cheapside, Shakespeare, Ben Jonson and their comrades held the famous combats of wine and wit; but these convivial encounters are more closely associated with the Apollo Club held at the Devil in Fleet Street. This house retained its vogue until well on in the eighteenth century. Colley Cibber was credited with composing his official odes there. The Half Moon, in the Half-Moon passage, Aldersgate, was a favorite resort of the dramatists Congreve and Wycherley. Of one of their colleagues, Dr. Doran gives a charming picture at the Mitre, St. James' Market, of Farquhar listening to a reading of Beaumont and Fletcher's "Scornful Lady," by "the beautiful and clever girl who became the delight of the English stage as Mistress Anne Oldfield." She was niece to Mrs. Voss, who kept the tavern. Another Restoration poet, Nat Lee, died at the Bear and Hounds, Butcher Row, Strand, in circumstances not unlike those which carried off Dr. Porson a century later after a fit at Cole's Coffee House, Cornhill. The Bear-at-the-Bridge-foot was a fashionable tavern used by the gallants of Charles II's court. It stood at the Southwark end of London Bridge.

Here Sir John Suckling wrote his "Letters from the wine drinkers to the water drinkers," and frolic here the Duke of Richmond eloped with the lovely Frances Stewart, who figures to this day as Britannia on the coinage. The ubiquitous Pepys was, of course, familiar with the place, and indeed he was with every other of the kind of that time extant. Among them he mentions the Three Cranes, with the best room in the house "a narrow doghole"; the Rose, where he went on Christmas eve, and drank burnt wine; the Castle, where the garrulous Sir Ellis Layton informs him respecting the new Admiralty Judge; the Dog, where he hears of the death of the King of Sweden, the Dolphin, where his share of the jollification after the victory of 1665 amounted to 84s.; the Swan, during the crisis of the fire, "and there drank and so home"; the Three Tuns, on May 9, when a murder had been committed, and at the same house on the 16th to dine with the Lord Mayor; the Triumph, after church to meet the Portuguese ladies of the Queen's suite, "and I see they have learned to kiss." The very last entry in the diary runs thus: "Thence to the World's End.

A Threadbare Compensation.
"She isn't at all handsome."
"—Auntie says so?"
The London Chronicle says:—The new A.D.C. and assistant military secretary to the Duke of Connaught, Lieut.-Col. W. N. Congreve, won the V. C. at Colenso, where he was among the wounded. His adventures on that desperate occasion rank among the most thrilling personal incidents of the war, and it was apparently only by a miracle that he came out of the affair alive. After venturing out and retrieving one of the guns whose crews had all been killed or wounded, Congreve on his way back saw Lieut. Roberts fall, and he at once went and brought his wounded comrade in. When the gallant rescuer had time at last to "take stock," he found that he had been shot through the leg, through the shoulder, and in the elbow, while a fourth bullet had carried away the toe of his boot. His horse ran him close, having brought three bullets back, "concealed about his person." Col. Congreve's V.C. was undoubtedly one of the best carried during the campaign.
