Things May Improve.

For six days the tempest had raged, and now as a final climax a funnel shaped cyclone was bearing down on them at the rate of a mile in thirteen seconds, and the careless hunters had left their cyclone cellars at headquarters, six miles away. The little cabin shook like a leaf. Its rude roof was leaking by the tubfuls, and they were standing in water up to their necks.

For three days they had eaten nothing but raw rubber boot and drunk nothing but water. Their powder was wet, and three grizzly bears under the shelter of an overhanging rock outside were shaking dice to see which of them would have to do without a man when the hunters came out.

It looked dark for them. Tony was ready to give up, but Max kept his courage, although he had just received a wireless that the bank in which his funds were deposited had failed and that his best girl had married another fellow. In a hoarse voice he whispered, "To be continued in our next!"
