"HIS happened long, long ago, when kings could do about as they pleased without asking any one's permission. It's different now. There are not many kings left who can throw people into prison or take their lives or take away their property without asking any one about it," said daddy one evening to Jack and Evelyn.

"The king in this story was a proud man who always needed money to build new palaces for himself and to buy for himself and his favorites all sorts of fine things. Of course the money had to come from somewhere, so he made the poor people pay it. But this king was not really bad at heart. "Once he had to cross a certain river, and he found that there was no bridge at the place where he wanted to get over. So he had a bridge built, and to get back the money it cost him he put a soldier at each end of the bridge. Whoever wanted to cross had to pay a penny. "Now, the soldier put at one end of the bridge was a bad man who wanted to get rich himself at the king's bridge. So while he let rich people pass after paying a penny, according to the king's order, he made the poor people pay twopence apiece. One penny went to the king and a penny the dishonest bridge keeper put into his own pocket. If any one refused to pay twopente he threatened to kill him with his sword. So they had to pay. "After awhile this reached the ears of the king. 'Aha,' said he, 'so this man whom I set to watch the bridge is becoming rich from it, is he? We'll see about that.' And he dressed himself as a poor man, took some of his soldiers with him and went to the bridge. The soldiers hid behind some bushes, where the bridge keeper could not see them, and the king approached.

"'Twopence for going across,' said the wicked soldier, who did not know "I have only a penny," aid the king. 'I was told that that was all the some foolish or disgraceful act he can Let patie have her perfect work in king asked for letting any one cross his bridge." "That is quite correct,' said the soldier. 'That is all the king asks. But I ask another penny. So you cannot cross unless you pay twopence."

"But I must get across,' said the king. 'My wife is ill on the other side portunity to retaliate.-American Mu of the river, and I cannot swim.' "'I don't care to hear any stories about your wife or about you either," said the bad man. And he lifted his sword as if he would strike the king.

"'You shall go to prison for that,' said the king. He blew his whistle, and out rushed his soldiers and arrested the wicked man. And the king put an honest man in his place."
