FALL BERRY PRUNING.

Cutting Away of Surplus Wood Gives recommend fall rather than spring pruning. I commence as soon as the leaves have partially fallen, trimming All entries, pedigrees and deposits out all drooping branches to encourage an upright growth, all dead and dying wood and all sprouts except two or three of the strongest for renewing the fruiting wood.

In removing the sprouts I prefer pulling them rather than cutting them off close to the ground, and where they do not come off easily with a good, vigorous pull I remove the soil at the base of the sprout and cut it off as low as possible. After the bush is trimmed and all grass, roots and weeds removed, mound up a little, covering all exposed rootlets. This operation serves as a fall hoeing and is much easier done then than in the spring, when the grass and weeds have more strongly fastened their roots in the ground. This pruning away of all surplus wood and sprouts in the fall gives added strength to the roots for sustaining and stimulating that part of the bush remaining.-Wyman Elliott, Minnesota
