The "Iron Count." as he sometimes was called, was past his sixtieth year. For twenty years he had been in command of the army. One had but to driving, riding and walking. Oftenlook at his strong, sardonic face to times the princess was barred from know that he was a fearless leader, a these simple pleasures by the exigensavage fighter. His eyes were black, piercing and never quiet; his hair and close cropped beard were almost snow white; his voice was heavy and without a vestige of warmth. Since her | sion and confer with the nobles on afbabyhood Yetive had stood in awe of fairs of weight and importance. Bevthis grim old warrior. It was no uncommon thing for mothers to subdue disobedient children with the threat to give them over to the Iron Count. "Old Marlanx will get you if you're not good," was a household phrase in Edelweiss. He had been married five times, and as many times had he been left a widower. If he were disconsolate in any instance, no one had been able to discover the fact. Enormously rich, as riches go in Graustark, he had found young women for his wives who thought only of his gold and his lands It was said that without exception they died happy. Death was a joy. The fortress overlooking the valley to the south was no more rugged and unyielding than the man who made his home within its walls. He lived there from choice, and it was with his own money that he fitted up the commandant's quarters in truly regal style. Power was more to him than wealth, though he enjoyed both. Colonel Quinnox brought news from the castle. Yetive's uncle and aunt, the Count and Countess Halfont, were eagerly expecting her return, and the city was preparing to manifest its joy travelers. Then the boom of cannon Purvis, auctioneer. The Iron Count handed her from the carriage at the portals of the palace, and she stood as one in a dream.

CHAPTER XI. HE two weeks following Beverly Calhoun's advent into the royal household were filled with joy and wonder for her. Daily she sent glowing letters to her father, mother and brothers in Washington, elaborating vastly upon the paradise into which she had fallen. her highly emotional mind the praises of Graustark had been but poorly sung. The huge old castle, relic of the feudal days, with its turrets and bastions and portcullises, impressed her with a never ending sense of wonder. Its great halls and stairways, its chapel, the throne room and the armor closet; its underground passages and dungeons all united to fill her imaginative soul with the richest, rarest joys of romance. Her apartments were near those the Princess Yetive. In the private intercourse enjoyed by these young wo en all manner of restraint was abandoned by the visitor and every vestige of royalty slipped from the princess Count Halfont and his adorable wife Mr. Chas. W. Wood, 34 Torrance St., the Countess Yvonne. both of whom Montreal, Que., writes:- "For two years , had grown old in the court, found the girl and her strange servant a source of wonder and delight.

Some days after Beverly's arrival there came to the castle Harry Anguish and his wife, the vivacious Dagtiny Dagmar became queen at once, and no one disputed her rule. Anguish the painter became Anguish

The staid, cautious price by the T. Milburn Co., Limited, ministers looked upon him with wonder, but so plausible did he make his proposals appear that they were forced to consider them seriously. The old Count of Marianx held him in great disdain and did n hesitate to expose his contempt. This did not disturb Anguish in the least, for he was as optimistic as the sunshine. His planfor the recapture of Gabriel was ridiculously improbable, but it was afterward seen that had it been attempted much distress and delay might actually have been avoided.

Yetive and Beverly, with Dagmar and the baby, made merry while the men were in council. Their mornings were spent in the shady park surrounding the castle, their afternoons in to grant audiences, observe certain customs of state, attend to the charities that came directly under her supervierly delighted in the throne room and the underground passages. They signified more to her than all the rest. She was shown the room in which Lorry had foiled the Viennese who once tried to abduct Yetive. The dungeon where Gabriel spent his first days of confinement, the tower in which Lorry had been held a prisoner and the monastery in the clouds were all places of unusual interest to her.

Some of the people of the city began to recognize the fair American girl who was a guest in the castle, and a certain amount of homage was paid to her. When she rode or drove in the streets, with her attendant soldiers, the people bowed as deeply and as respectfully as they did to the princess herself, and Beverly was just as grand and gracious as if she had been born with a scepter in her hand. The soft moonlight nights charmed her with a sense of rapture never known before. With the castle brilliantly illuminated, the halls and drawing rooms filled with gay courtiers, the harpists at their posts, the military band playing in the parade ground, the balconies and porches offering their most inviting allurements, it is no wonder that Beverly was entranced. War in the most exuberant fashion. As had no terrors for her. If she thought they drew up to the gates the shouts of | of it at all it was with the fear that it the people came to the ears of the might disturb the dream into which she had fallen. True, there was little or calm and unmoved in the face of all still, although there was not an hour in which preparations for the worst were Past the great Hotel Regengetz and neglected. To Beverly Calhoun it the tower moved the gay procession | meant little when sentiment was laid into the broad stretch of boulevard aside. To Yetive and her people this Dangloss, going back and forth between Edelweiss and the frontier north of Ganlook, where the best of the police walls the sentries came to parade rest; and secret service watched with the settling news to the ministry. Axphain troops were engaged in the annual maneuvers just across the border in their own territory. Usually these were held in the plains near the capital, and there was a sinister significance in the fact that this year they were being carried on in the rough southern extremity of the principality, within a day's march of the Graustark line, fully two months earlier than usual. The doughty baron reported that foot, horse and artillery were engaged in the drills, and that fully 8,000 men were massed in the south of Axphain. The fortifications of Ganlook, Labbot and other towns in northern Graustark were strengthened with almost the same care as those in the south, where conflict with Dawsbergen might first be expected. General Marlanx and his staff rested neither day nor night. The army of Graustark was ready. Underneath the castle's gay exterior there smoldered the fire of battle, the tremor of defiance.

Late one afternoon Beverly Calhoun and Mrs. Anguish drove up in state to the Tower, wherein sat Dangloss and his watchdogs. The scowl left his face as far as nature would permit, and he welcomed the ladies warmly.

"I came to ask about my friend, the goat hunter," said Beverly, her cheeks a trifle rosier than usual.

"He is far from an amiable person your highness," said the officer. When discussing Baldos he never failed to address Beverly as "your highness." "The fever is gone, and he is able to walk without much pain, but he is as restless as a witch. Following instructions, I have not questioned him concerning his plans, but I fancy he is eager to return to the hills."

"What did he say when you gave him my message?" asked Beverly. "Which one, your highness?" asked he, with tantalizing density.

"Why, the suggestion that he should come to Edelweiss for better treatment," retorted Beverly severely. "He said he was extremely grateful

"I believe that you can conquer even that stubborn fellow in Ganlook," he said, fumbling with his glasses. "He is the most obstinate being I know, and yet in ten minutes you could bring him to terms, I am sure. He could not resist you." "He still thinks I am the princess?"

"He does and swears by you." "Then my mind is made up. I'll go to Ganlook and bring him back with me, willy nilly. He is too good a man to be lost in the hills. Goodby, Baron Dangloss! Thank you ever and ever so much. Oh, yes; will you write an order delivering him over to me? The hospital people may be-er-disobliging, you know."

"It shall be in your highness' hands this evening." The next morning, with Colonel Quinnox and a small escort, Beverly Calhoun set off in one of the royal coaches for Ganlook, accompanied by faithful Aunt Fanny. She carried the order from Baron Dangloss and a letter from Yetive to the Countess Rallowitz in suring hospitality overnight in the northern town. Lorry and the royal household entered merrily into her project, and she went away with the godspeeds of all. The Iron Count himself rode beside her coach to the city gates, an unheard of condescension.

"Now, you'll be sure to find a nice place for him in the castle guard, won't you, Count Marlanx?" she said at the parting, her hopes as fresh as the daisy in the dew, her confidence supreme. The count promised faithfully, even eagerly. Colonel Quinnox, trained as he was in the diplomacy of silence, could scarcely conceal his astonishment at the conquest of the hard old warrior.

Although the afternoon was well spent before Beverly reached Ganlook, she was resolved to visit the obdurate sourcefulness to secure his promise to start with her for Edelweiss on the following morning. The coach delivered her at the hospital door in grand style. When the visitor was ushered into the snug little antercom of the governor's office her heart was throbbing and her composure was undergoing a most unusual strain. It annoyed her to discover that the approaching contact with a humble goat hunter was giving her such unmistak- roses of the world in such great able symptoms of perturbation.

From an upstairs window in the hospital the convalescent but unhappy patient witnessed her approach and arrival. His sore, lonely heart gave a bound of joy, for the days had seemed long since her departure.

He had had time to think during these days too. Turning over in his mind all of the details in connection with their meeting and their subsequent intercourse, it began to dawn upon him that she might not be what she assumed to be. Doubts assailed him, suspicions grew into amazing forms of certainty. There were times when he laughed sardonically at himself for being taken in by this strange but charming young woman, but through it all his heart and mind were being drawn more and more fervently toward her. More than once he called himself a fool and more than once he dreamed foolish dreams of her, prin cess or not. Of one thing he was sure -he had come to love the adventure for the sake of what it promised, and there was no bitterness beneath his suspicions.

Arrayed in clean linen and presentable clothes, paie from indoor confinement and fever, but once more the straight and strong cavalier of the hills, he hastened into her presen when the summons came for him to descend. He dropped to his knee and kissed her hand, determined to play the game notwithstanding his doubts. As he arose she glanced for a filtting second into his dark eyes, and her own

"They say I am as good as new," he milingly answered. "A trifle weak and uncertain in my lower extremities, but a few days of exercise in the mountains will overcome all that. Is all well with you and Graustark? They will give me no news here, by whose order I do not know."

"Turn about is fair play, sir. It is a well established fact that you will give them no news. Yes, all is well with me and mine. Were you beginning to think that I had deserted you? It has been two weeks, hasn't it?" "Ah, your highness, I realize that you have had much more important things to do than to think of poor Baldos. am exceedingly grateful for this sign of interest in my welfare. Your visit is the brightest experience of my life." "Be seated!" she cried suddenly. "You are too ill to stand."

"Were I dying I should refuse to be seated while your hishness stands," said he simply. His shoulders seemed to square themselves involuntarily, and his left hand twitched as though accustomed to the habit of touching a sword hilt. Beverly sat down instant- Mothers ly. With his usual easy grace he took a chair near by. They were alone in the antechamber.

"Even though you were on your last legs?" she murmured, and then wondered how she could have uttered anything so inane. Somehow she was beginning to fear that he was not the ordinary person she had judged him to be. "You are to be discharged from the hospital tomorrow," she added hastily.

"Tomorrow?" he cried, his eyes lighting with joy. "I may go then?" "I have decided to take you to Edelstared at her for a full minute as though doubting his ears.

"No!" he said at last, his jaws settling, his eyes glistening. It was a terrible setback for Beverly's confidence. "Your highness forgets that I have your promise of absolute free-"But you are to be free," she protested. "You have nothing to fear. It is have to go unless you really want to. But my heart is set on having you inin the castle guard." His bitter, mocking laugh surprised and wounded her, which he was quick to see, for his contrition was immediate. "Pardon, your highness. I am a rade, ungrateful wretch, and I deserve the hment instead of reward. The proposal was so astounding that I forot myself completely," he said. Whereupon, catching him in this contrite mood, she began a determined assault against his resolution. For an hour she devoted ber whole heart and soul to the task of overcoming his prejudices, fears and objections, meeting his protestations firmly and logically, unconscious of the fact that her very enthusiasm was betraying her to him. The first signs of weakening inspired her afresh and at last she was riding over him roughshod, a happy victor. She made promises that Yetive herself could not have made; she offerpatient at once, relying upon her re- ed inducements that never could be carried out, although in her zeal she did not know it to be so; she painted such pictures of ease, comfort and pleasure that he wondered why royalty did not exchange places with its servants. In the end, overcome by the spirit of adventure and a desire to be near her, he agreed to enter the service for si: .nonths, at the expiration of which me he was to be released from all obligations if he so desired.

"But my friends in the pass, your "what is to become of them? They are waiting for me out there in the wilderness. I am not base enough to desert "Can't you get word to them?" she the city too. We will provide for the poor fellows, believe me." "That, at least, is impossible, your highness," he said, shaking his head sadly. "You will have to slay them before you can bring them within the city gates. My only hope is that Franz may be here tonight. He has permission to enter, and I am expecting him today or tomorrow."

He their family. Only themselves know how they are distressed by headaches and backaches, dragging down pains and nervous weakness; how their nights are often sleepless, and they arise to a new day's work tired, depressed and unrefreshed. Such mothe's should know that these sufferings are usually due to a lack of good nourishing blood. They not compulsory, you know. You don't should know that the thing above all others they need to give them new health and strength is rich, ced blood, and that among all medicines there is none can equal Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for their bloodmaking, health-restoring qualities. Every suffering woman, every woman wi'h a home and family to care for should give these pills a fair trial, for they will keep her in health and strength, and make her work easy. Here is strong proof that these pills do what is claimed for them. Mrs. Henry Thomas, Dryden, Ont., says:

"When my second child was born I was so weak and run down that I could scarcely walk across a room. My baby was small and weak also, and cried and worried night and day un al I discovered that the child was starving, as my nurse had turned almost to water. My husband got me a supply of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, and I began taking them. The first beneficial effects were noticed in that my child began to thrive, as my nurse began to improve, and baby slept better and naturally. It was not long until I began to feel the improvement myself, and I daily gained new strength, and baby was growing very rosy and fat. I continued using the pills while I was highness," he said in surrendering, nursing him and found myself with all the vigor of good health, and able to easily do my housework, which had been so great a drag on me before. I am now never withasked eagerly. "Let them come into out Dr. Williams' Pink Pills in the house, and take an occasional dose when I feel tired. I can strongly recommend these Pills to all nursing women, especially if weak or run
