COMEDY IN A BOOKSTORE.

Queer Experience In an Attempt to Buy a Rare Work. A correspondent of the Glasgow Herald contributes the following amusing account of an attempt to buy a rare book: In his "Autocrat of the Breakfast Table" Oliver Wendell Holmes mentions a curious book called "Thinks I to Myself" as having been written and published in England by a person of quality about the beginning of the last century. Some time ago, among a number of secondhand books exposed for sale outside a shop in Glasgow, I noticed one in elegant but faded binding. It was "Thinks I to Myself," in two thin volumes. The first sentence took my fancy: "I was born of very worthy, honest and respectable parents -at least I think so!" I went into the shop with the volterior. "What is the value of these?" He turned them over carelessly and selling books, and I gravely responded, "Very well-how much for them, then?" "Three ha'pence," he said. "Per volume?" I asked. "For the two," he replied, whereupon I put the books into my pocket and handed him the money. He looked at me wonderingly and inquired, "Where did you get them?"

"Outside, at the door." "Why," he gasped, "I thought you were selling
