Letter of Simonides.

J. COLLING, B. A.

Now it chanced that having journeyed far by land and on the sea, I came again to a populous city, large and prosperous, called in the tongue of the barbarians, Lindsa, but which in the Greek tongue would be called Peloponnesus, or the city of mud. And it lieth far toward the north star and is nigh unto a region where men may not dwell because of the cold.

And so owing, as is my won't, my eager longing for knowledge of the pursuits of men, I betook me once more to the schools, and chiefly to one called "The Poor Man's College." Tho' why it should be so called I know not, unless it be from the poverty of the priests who conduct the lectures. And there met me at the door of the college a certain old man, exceeding grim and fierce of countenance, concerning whom one of the youths told me that he was a Briton and had served in the Imperial war-galleys, and had been, moreover, a man of great prowess, and that the fame of his deeds had spread through the land, and that through the gratitude of the Queen he had retired with a pension, though what a pension is I know not, but I observed that he bore in his teeth a slender stem with a bowl at the end, and that he seat forth from his mouth great clouds of smoke whereof his quavers, which they call the basement, stank exceedingly. He, therefore, conducted me to a little pen small and narrow, which they call the "Room of the Priests." And when I had waited for some time there came one and pulled a string, whereat a bell rang violently and then came in the chief priest, whom they call principal, and other priests came also, whom they call assistants, and a priestess. And I observed moreover that all of them were fair and tall, save only the chief priest, but therein was a just degree of Providence, inasmuch as wherein he lacked by nature here he compensated in rank. But he gave me most kindly greeting and straightway told me of all those things which I desired to know.

And he declared that he had been much distressed of late by frequent changes of the staff, for that one of the priests had gone farming, having previously had a predilection thereto, and that another had walked off, and that another had gone far toward the setting sun, to the land of the Yukon, being lured by the love of gold.

And he told me many marvellous things that the youths did, the like whereof I had never heard in any other land. For there came to the youths not only many holy days, but also a certain evening which they call the Hallowed Evening. To me, accordingly, not having thought much upon the matter, it seemed that the time would be set apart for prayer and fasting with much meditation on man's sinfulness and the temptations of the Wicked One. But he told me that on the contrary, the evening was given up to merry-making, for that the maidens boiled taffy which they supplied to the youths and that many of the youths became sick, but whether the taffy contained a philtre whereof the youths became lovesick, or whether he meant a certain other kind of sickness, I have not to say. And the youths, too, disported themselves with many mischievous pranks, which they are exceedingly fertile in conceiving. For they rang door-bells and carried off gates, and some would cast at the doors, cabbages whereof the heads had been removed, and that certain youths were even known to throw rotten eggs, and that in former days they delighted to visit one of the priests, by name, Timotheus Agricola and had borne off from his house saudary pumpkins and squash and a quantity of ice cream wherewith he proposed to regale himself.

And he said that on the last occasion, whereon the evening was observed the youths invaded the backyards of certain of the priests, uttering warlike cries and discharging their pea-shooters, and that they called often for Doodle and Mary who had been confined by their mothers through fear of a bell, though why they should fear a bell is beyond comprehension. And
