LADY NORA

all my devotion to you and my friendship for you, nothing you could say or do would induce me to accept that role. I am going to stay with Mrs. Vavator for a while. Thanks to dear Lady Pentreath and her sweet generous thoughtfulness—with a taunt in every accent—"I need not turn out in the world friendless and homeless to earn my bread!"

"And nothing I could say would induce you to alter your determination, eh, Isabelle, my dear?" the Earl asks, with a chuckle and a crafty smile at her. "No, nothing," Isabelle replies coldly. "The only word you could say to induce me to stay I know you will never speak. I have been your friend, confidant, adviser, helper—what not; but the moment you ceased to have need of me you would put me aside or suffer it to be done. I prefer putting myself aside to suffering you or your second wife to do it."

"You—you are making mighty sure of my having a second wife, and a new Countess, and all the rest of it!" the Earl says, wriggling a little on his chair and with a sneaking pretence of being displeased. Isabelle looks at him with all the scorn she feels for him in her bright eyes.

"Not half so sure as she is making of it and waiting for it," she retorts, with a contemptuous smile. "though I am sure enough. Why, I have her wedding-present all ready for her! I'll show it to you. It is charmingly pretty, I think. I hope you and she will think the same." She takes a tiny morocco case out of her pocket and shows him, nestling in the dark velvet, a beautiful diamond-and-sapphire ring.

"It's not quite new," Miss Glover says brightly, while Lord Pentreath with his ugly dry puckered lip held in by his teeth and his face an unwholesome purple red, stares at her and the ring alternately, "but it is a lovely ring. You have seen it before, I'm sure, and I have no doubt that dear Joyce will be very glad to have it in her own possession again. It has been a useful little ornament in its time," Miss Glover adds, with an air of calm contemplation and unlicensed lovers. I got it out of the possession of the last one, and now he is begging earnestly of me to give it back again to him. Poor Dallas Glynn—this ring has cost him dear! It may cost others dearer before we see the last of it," Miss Glover says, with a sigh, to which his lordship responds with a very certain and very certain muttering words. "What are you saying?" his tormenter asks in a very shocked tone. "Lord Pentreath, I did not think you could use such language! I was just going to read you the letter for fun"—in a very injured tone. "It came yesterday morning to me. Poor unlucky wretch! I suppose Joyce insists on having the ring returned, lest it damage her chances; and his jealous wife is vowing vengeance because he can't explain certain things satisfactorily, and poor Dallas is telling lies through thick and thin to save himself! Listen to what a fright he's in!" Miss Glover says gaily. "Whatever sum the ring has cost you," she reads, "I will pay you again willingly, and as much more as you think fit to ask of me." Poor Dallas—he'd give a thousand pounds for it. I verily believe, and Joyce would give two thousand and more! I might make a lot of money out of this dangerous little bauble," she laughs. "I might establish a system of 'chantage' on the future. I mean on Miss Murray—if I were unprincipled enough to do so. Poor thing! Her prudence did not equal her ambition when she gave that ring to a married lover. Oh, very well, Lord Pentreath"—in a shocked voice—"if you cannot control your temper, I had better go away!"

"For, in a sudden spasm of rage, his lordship has dashed both ring and letter off the table on to the floor. Isabelle stoops and picks them up, composedly, and is silently leaving the room. "Stop!" he growls in a very ungentlemanly manner. "Let me see that letter!"

He reads it from beginning to end silently and slowly, and gives it back without a word. "I will say good-bye to you now and here," Miss Glover says gently, after a pause. "I shall be gone early—perhaps before you are down in the morning. With many thanks for every kindness you have shown me, Lord Pentreath, I say good-bye; and Heaven bless you and keep you from sorrow in days to come!"

She kisses the hand his lordship gives her, sulkily though he does so; and her stately robes—Isabelle is always clad in princesses in these days—rustle and swirl as she curtsies deeply and reverently. And then she leaves the room; and when Lord Pentreath comes down the next morning his "little friend" has gone. Gone forever, she almost fears for a month or two. After that, a star of hope rises on her horizon—a constellation in which one can discern the outlines of the form of a coronet.

Dallas Glynn fails, as Lady Nora failed, in recovering the ring from Isabelle Glover's keeping; but one morning in the spring of the second year after Lady Pentreath's death Joyce Murray has her unlucky jewel restored to her.

It is sent to her by the low-born rival who has triumphed over her at last, and left her with nothing to show for her wasted years, her ambitious longings, her falsehood to herself, to love, to truth—nothing but the fairy gold of withered leaves, the dead hopes and ambitions that shrivel and flutter away from her grasp.

just four months old at this time, and, as all such miraculously wise and beautiful first-born infants do, is daily impressing her admiring father and mother with her great and varied power of "noticing," "laughing," and marvellous general intelligence. She is a very fair specimen of babyhood certainly—a "Baby May" truly, as she has been baptized by her mother's wish "Maria—Dallas" and her father thinks the name is not at all pretty enough for his daughter. And it is on the auspicious occasion of celebrating the fourth month of the young lady's mundane existence that Dallas Glynn and his wife receive wedding-cake and cards, and learn that there is a new Countess of Pentreath. And it is the new Countess—the Right Honorable Lady Isabelle Glynn, nee Glover—who sends back to poor Joyce Murray that fatal ring which has cost her a coronet.

But on that other woman, the bitter sorrow of whose life has been caused by Joyce Murray's selfish vanity and falsehood—on her through all has been true to her womanhood, true to her love, faithful in her duties, patient in her troubles, meekly looking to Heaven for help and strength and patience—on her the smile of Heaven rests, as it surely does on all chastened faithful souls sooner or later.

For Yolande Glynn and her husband the fairy gold of lost happiness, wealth, and worldly rank is changed through the blessing of Heaven to the real gold of the love and peace of a godly life, which "with contentment is great gain."
