ONE CHRISTMAS EVE

"You'll be about in a few days. Can you talk?"

"Yes—a little."

"The men laughed then. It was somewhat forced; they had been through a heavy strain. But they laughed."

"Oh, you'll be all right. We'll be getting back now." Then they remembered the message.

"Here's the telegram we was bringin' you." They stopped. What fools they were. The shock might kill the man now. They tried to retract but the sick man motioned to his wife.

"Read it, Ellen, please."

She opened it slowly, with hands that trembled, and tore the yellow envelope half in two.

"Oh John—" There was pent ecstasy in her voice. "Listen." Her eyes glowed. "Come home, John. I was mistaken. Forgive me. We'll have Christmas when you come. Forgive me. 'Father.'"

It had been cabled from London ten days before.

The husband moved his arms stiffly in invitation and the wife sobbed her joy out on his breast. The children stood and watched, awestruck and silent. Then the little one, with a sudden thought, moved to his father's knee.

"Aden, dada, aden," he crowed.

The father touched the golden head gently. "Soon, Doodle, soon. Wait a bit, though," and he stroked feebly the little cheek. He spoke low to his wife.

"We'll go home, Ellen, as soon as I can."

The men from the village had stood silent and embarrassed. They had looked out of the window over the wide whiteness, and shuffled now and then uneasily.

"Good news ye got, then?" one of them questioned.

Then the wife told them how it was they had come to this wild new place from the homeland, how it was for something the husband had never done he had been compelled to leave the old manor there—and how they were all going home again now—going home for Christmas.

"It won't be Christmas, though," she smiled, "but—we'll be so happy."

"I see. Kinder Christmas better late than never, eh? Well, we'll come up and help yuz down with your stuff in a couple of weeks. Mr. Summers will be well an' around again then."

And waiving aside all invitations to stay all night, they opened the door and closed it hurriedly after them with a cheery "good-bye."

The four crept close together in the warm glow of the stove. It was early, very early Christmas morning.

"We're going home, Ellen," he whispered.

THE REVOLT AGAINST GRAFT

THE PEOPLE ARE WAKING UP TO FIGHT AGAINST THE REAL "BEASTS OF EPHE-SUS."

(From the Mail & Empire.)

A pleasing feature of the Colchester election, which the Conservative candidate, Mr. John Stanfield, carried by a majority of 223, was the resistance offered by the voters to the graft argument. This argument was submitted by Finance Minister Fielding, who pointed to the power the Government has in the matter of local appropriations, and urged the people to cast their votes in favor of the men who are able to spend the money in the constituency. Mr. Fielding's presentation of the case was supported by other campaigners who dealt with different phases of the same issue.

It was alleged, for example, that the Government has raised the pay of railway men, and that it is able to make reductions. This was an appeal to the pockets of the employees of the Administration, united with a thinly veiled threat of punishment if the votes called for should not be delivered. While the railway employees were thus assailed the workers in the iron industries were called to witness that the Ottawa men give tariff protection, and pay out bounties to these enterprises, and the suggestion was made that unless the employees should vote en masse for the Government candidate, the favors received would be withdrawn. By these various methods, all of them corrupt the Government sought to advance the cause of its nominee. Yet, when the returns came in, it was found that the ministry had been routed. The Government organ at Halifax now complains bitterly of the railway officials who dared to vote against their masters—the Ottawa Ministers—and suggests that they be duly punished. The same agency treats as treason the conduct of the iron and steel employees, who, in face of the fact that the Government pays a bounty to their industry, had the audacity to vote for the Conservative or anti-graft candidate. While the public works and graft arguments failed so signally in the east, they have also had two or three setbacks in Ontario. A very notable rebuff was given to them by the people of Durham, when Mr. Aylesworth promised to bring the Trent Canal to Port Hope if he should be elected. The bribe was spurned, and Mr. Aylesworth was rejected. Another case was furnished in East Elgin, where Messrs. Aylesworth and Hyman appeared on the public platform surrounded by contractors who appealed for support for the Government on the ground that it would mean a harbor and a railway subsidy for the constituency. The corruptionist Ministers said their say; the people refused to be influenced by them. A third case was presented in East Northumberland. Here a wharf and a section of the Trent Canal was offered to the electors if they would fall down and worship King Graft. The result was a larger majority against the Government than that which had been previously recorded. It would seem from these experiences that the influences of the appeal to cupidity is not so strong as at one time it may have been. Ministers present their claims on a cash basis or with works of various kinds supporting them; but the people pay no attention to the corrupt suggestions, and vote as they please.

For this state of affairs there must be some explanation. What is it? Have public works, railways, subsidies, local grants and other inducements which the Government holds out lost their usefulness? Are the people indifferent to the advantages the Government offers? Do the electors regard with distaste the returns which Messrs. Fielding and Aylesworth offer for support? The answer to these questions cannot be in the affirmative. What then is the cause of the changed attitude towards the public works and the subsidy bribe? There can be little doubt that the people resist the bribe, first, because they have no confidence in the men who offer it, and, secondly, because they regard the destruction of graft as of more importance than the securing of some suggested public work. When the electors rise superior to the appeal to self-interest it is a sign that the rottenness at Ottawa is becoming a matter of general knowledge, and that the country is getting ready to cut it out.
