HOME FOR CHRISTMAS He was seated in his desk-chair with a time-card in his hand And a smile upon his features that I could not understand, When I found him at the office, after hours, all alone; The lamps had long been lighted, the whistle long since blown; He had evidently been reading from a letter there in sight Which a woman's hand had written if my guess was half way right. And something in its contents must have held a pleasing part, ent is given a moderate amount of For he did not hear me enter and my first word made him start. "Well, old chap," says I, "why linger, when your busy mates have gone? of citron ishred fine, twelve eggs, excessive the parents will please Don't you know it's past the hour, and you still toiling on ?" whites and yolks beaten separately; communicate that fact to the prin- He reached out for the letter as though he did not hear, Here's a letter she has written, asking that her boys come home, The family now is scattered and she's living there alone; So I've wired her that I'm coming and I'm looking up a train, And really I can hardly wait to get back home again. Of course our work is heavy right at this time of the year My desk is piled with matters that need my attention here; But I can't resist her letter, let me read you just a line : Come home and I will feed you on those mincemeat pies of mine; I'll let you try my new preserves and sample all my "jell," And bake some of those cookies that you always loved so well.' Then at the end she says: 'Please come, I'm getting old you know,

You've been away these seven years, I want to see you so.'

So I'm going home for Christmas, for I can't resist the call,

It's the only place one ought to be on Christmas, after all;

I've wired her that I'm coming, and I'm looking up the train,
