THE STORY OF TITO.

Tito was a brown little Peruvian Indian with coal black hair, bead-like eyes and teeth so clear and white that they looked like a double row of pearls between his ever-smiling lips. Tito came along in this way: In 1887 I began a small job printing business in Laredo, Tex. It was not long before I formed the acquaintance of Senor Jose Schleicher, who, in addition to being a manufacturer of rubber stamps, was also engaged in job printing.

Chancing to be in Nuevo Laredo, Mex., one evening about a week ago I was accosted by a willamson looking official whom I had seen lurking around the tienda several times, asking if I had engaged with Garza in resuscitating El Horizonte. On replying that I had made no official mention of this offer, he ominously rejoined: "It will be well for you to drop that man. He has long been a source of annoyance to our government, and it will be worse for you and his abettors if he renews his attacks."

He had passed in a whirl close to them. Upon the gray drap of the dais the flowers stuck out in a provoking tuff, decorating her bosom as if to show it, and her cavering, a gem of 20, overflowing with pride, seemed to breathe the odor of the bouquet and draw from the faint perfume a strength always new to clasp his companions against him.

CLEARED UP HIS DESK. How One Man's Editorial Poison Proved to Be Another One's Meat. The editor sat at his littered desk. While a hook of utter weariness passed over his face with a sorrowful trace.

PAULE'S BLUEBELLS. They arrived at nightfall. In the distance, Most-Valeria was seen as quiet and good-natured as a slumbering lion. A mist enveloped it, falling from the blue sky, over which the setting sun cast flames.

MET HIS MATCH. How Domestic Occurrences Knocked Out a Man of Adventures. He had fought the polar bear, and the lion in his lair, and he had monkey with gorillas on the shores of Benguela;

Notes About Women. The general hospital authorities of Montreal have, after long deliberation, forbidden all women students to enter the wards.
