In the court yard were massed detachments of infantry, and as the British ambassador drove to the square drums were beaten and bugles sounded. This greeting was followed by the band playing the British national anthem, "God Save the Queen." After Lord Dufferin had made the tormal presentation of his credentials to the president, he and M. -The paying teller of the oldest bank in Boston had a rather peculiar experience a short time ago, says the Bankers' Gazette. A man presented himself at the teller's window with a cheque to be cashed; being unknown to the teller, his usual formula, "Have you anything about you to identify yourself with?" was put to the party. The man looked at the teller and then proceeded to take off his overcoat, then be delibererately removed his undercoat. The teller by this time would have been somewhat worried had there not been strong bars on the counter; but when the man unbuttoned his shirt sleeve and commenced to roll up his shirt sleeve on his right arm, the teller appeared paralyzed. When the sleeve was rolled up the party showed to the aston-ished teller, indellibly printed into his arm, his name in full, and said, "Will that do?" It did do. The identification was complete.

—A London cable says:—At a circus per-formance in Hednesford, Staffordshire, yesterday, Delhi Montano, a negro lion tamer, entered a cage to subdue three savage bears and a hyena. As he was entering the cage he stumbled and fell forward into the cage, and the iron door fell with a crash behind him, cutting off his means of escape. Instantly the times and made cower before the stroke of his whip, realized the tamer was at their mercy. The hyena seized him with its fangs. The brute tore the man's flesh in a horrible manner, and then lifted him from the floor of the cage and flung his body to the opposite side. The bears then seized the tamer, and tossing him from one to the other, worried him like a terrier would a rat, at the same time repeatedly biting him in a savage manner, and tearing his limbs and body cruelly. When the brutes were finally beaten cff and Montano was dragged from the cage he was found to be just alive. After lingering in great agony for an hour death put an end to his misery.

-A London cable says: Rumors of the progress of the disease of Emperor William's ear have had a disquieting effect in Barlin official circles. The emperor was to Chancellor Caprivi the other day as regards the passing of the school bill before the recess of the landtag. The chancellor, after waiting in the antechamber half an hour, was informed that the emporer could not see him. The inflamation, which heretofore has been internal, is said to have caused a painful swelling in the side of the emporer's neck, and to have extended towards the base of the brain. The result is that the emporer suffers from insomonis, and is exceedingly irritable. Nevertheless he attends to his duties as usual, although against the advice of his physicians. It is thought the excitement of the last two weeks, including the riots and storms of opposition against the school bill, has aggravated bis case. The emperor makes every effort to quiet the apprehensions which his condition excites among his family and ministers. His frequent appearance on horseback on the streets is said to be due to his desire to disprove the disquieting reports afloat as regards his health.

There are from fifteen to twenty townships containing a large number of small and beautiful lakes. These townships are unsettled and to a great extent unfitted for cultivation. The timber in this territory will be preserved and the reserve become a preserve for game, which is fast becoming extinct throughout Canada. The commission has already been appointed to investigate the character of these townships and ascertain those best adapted for a forest reserve, as well as the cost and best mode of maintaining it. These lakes and streams abound in fish, and the district is also the home of game and deer.

METHODS OF FRENCH WRITERS.

Amusing Stories of Noted Men in Throes of Literary Creation.

We have recently been treated to some amusing information concerning the way in which the great French authors do, or have done, their work. Victor Hugo, for instance, always wrote standing at a high desk, especially construsted for him, throwing off sheet after sheet as fast as he filled it, till he would be quite snowed up in leaves of foolscap. He often rose in the middle of the night to note down an idea or a verse. He got up for the day usually at 7 o'clock, and would devote from six to eight hours per diem to his work. He made but few corrections, his poems being thought out complete in his brain before he put pen to paper. It is a well-known fact that he indulged in the arduous task of composition while traversing the streets of Paris on the top of an omnibus When working out some great conception he would spend hours in this way.

The elder Dumas used to begin work by taking off his coat. He would then roll his shirt sleeves up to the elbows and would seat himself at his writing table, covering with dizzy velocity sheet after sheet of blue office paper with the delicate caligraphy, legible as copper-plate and fine as that of a fashionable lady, which had proved his first bread winner in his early days. His son also uses blue glazed paper of the largest size, and always writes with a quill pen, several dozens of which are prepared and placed in neat bundles on the desk in the library. He likes, he says, to hear the quill pen "scream" on the paper. His comedies are executed in the silence and seclusion of the country. Alphonse Daudet spends whole days at his desk, trying, in the ardor of composition, to distract his thoughts from the tortures inflicted magistrate, "and I came from Brock town- upon him by the chronic rheumatism that ship. My uncle was king of Brock." "Was has afflicted him for long years past. He is so very near-sighted that he writes with his head bent down close to the paper, almost touching it with his nose. Emile Zola's habits are extremely regular. He takes a walk every morning, usually leaving his house, whether at Medan or at Paris, about 9 o'clock. He lunches at midday, and writes from I o'clock till 6, receiving no visitors and transacting no business in the afternoon. He has a particular liking for large and massive pieces of furniture, so his writing table and his library chairs are of colossal proportions, as is also his inkstand, which is in bronze and represents a lion.

De Musset always wrote at night, in a room brilliantly lighted up with lamps and candles. Sardou receives callers before luncheon, and is invisible from 1 o'clock to dinner time, being absorbed in writing. He writes a very minute hand, corrects, changes, and alters his work continually, and is far from being satisfied with what he has done, even when it finally leaves his hand. He is an incomparable stage director for his own plays, and often makes on the margin of his manuscripts rough sketches of the scenery and of the attitudes of the personages that he considers necessary for certain important situations.

George Sand always wrote at night, and when the fever of composition was upon her she was wont to write all night. There is a story told of her finishing a novel at 1 o'clock in the morning, and immediately taking up a fresh quire of paper and writing the first chapter of a new one before she retired to rest. Like Victor Hugo, Francois Coppee has need of motion when composing his poetry, and works out his ideas while taking long walks through the streets of Paris. Guy de Maupassant planned out his novels and stories while on his yacht, and once returned to land, he put his matured ideas upon paper with great rapidity. Henri Rochefort is an excitable writer. He begins his work always in a very cerrect costume. Then, as he proceeds, he will first tear off his coat, next his waistcoat, and then his collar and cravat. It is fortunate if he does not ruin his shirt front by pulling it open, regardless of buttonholes and studs.—Philadelphia Telegraph.
