Nat and Natty

Natty Byrne sat on his high stool near the one window of the cabin in the falling dusk. He was tired of waiting, very tired, but his grandfather's orders had been explicit: "Sit here, Natty, till I see you."

tion and with them came a renewed sense of his duty as best. "Are you tired, cousin Tim?" he asked. "Dog tired, boy!"

For such exercises, and he had to fall upon his knees to kiss the most forehead. Tim Daly did not turn, but he saw what was coming. He saw Nat remained on his knees for a minute and the watcher of the shadow saw and the sign of the cross made on brow and breast.

Dear Sirs,—Good for Carey, Kennedy, Davis & Son, and the Bathing Co. As for Kitchener & Rider, we must see how they will ride—that $2,000 bonus is not a goal mark in their favor.

and the fact that there has been only one or two failures in the wholesale carriage manufacturing trade speaks volumes for the business. Does Mr. Taylor mean to say that the trade of this country is undergoing a general decline?
