The boat capsized and went down, taking its occupant with it. -James Conley was almost killed Wed-

Conley was standing directly under the cabin, when a strong wind threw it to the ground, pinning him beneath it. It required the efforts of four men to remove the cabin from Conley, who was conveyed home in a wagon, and is now lying in a precarious condition under the care of two doctors.

A SAILOR'S ADVENTURE.

Larry Marker, first two days ashore from a lengthy China cruise, pushed open the door of one of the numerous grog shops well lined with the "shiners," and he had been having and was yet having a "good | time," while he saw the town and got some of the kinks out of his legs. Larry was by no means a reckless fellow, but he did like to spend money freely when he had it, and this was one of those occas-"Hello, Larry !" said a heavily bearded man leaning against the bar, "where did y' drop from? How long a' y' been ashore ?" Larry looked at the speaker an instant and then wrung the hand that was put out "Blow me, Jim, but I never 'spected to see y'! I just came from th' China seas.

What a' y' doin'?" "Same ol' thing-Coastin'!" "Thet so? Well, I wouldn't mind tryin' it m'self, I'm gettin' tired o' these long

"There's a good many o' the same mind, I tell you! Y' know the Carstairs? Well, nine o' her men desarted to-day, couldn't stand th' treatment old Tasker giv' 'em, and now she's a'lyin' out in th' bay short handed, all ready to sail, but ain't got 'nuff men by three or four to handle her ropes. Sarves old Tasker right, too, I say. Never was a meaner cuss in a captain's berth." "Right y' are there, Jim, right y' are," returned Larry, and the two fell to talking

A few minutes later Larry Marker had left the place and with bent head was pushing his way along the uneven pavement which bordered upon the wharves. His lodgings were at a sailor's boarding house at the lower end of the shipping front. The rain beat furiously in his tace and the water got in his eyes and half blinded him. The night was a dark one anyhow and the lamps which lit the pavement were so few and far between as to be almost

He had gone a couple of blocks in this way, hardly looking around at all, when suddenly something thick was thrown over his head and a pair of arms were clasped about his own as he tried to tear the covering from him. Then, kicking and struggling with might and main, he felt himself picked up bodily, by what he judged must be a couple of men and carried along at a dog trot. Where he was going he had not the least As to who had him, he had even less idea if that was possible. All he knew was that a thick covering, which felt like a double gunny sack, was over his head and that a hand on his mouth prevented his In a few minutes he heard the steps of those carrying him resounding on planking and he came to the conclusion that they were on one of the wharves. Then he heard a man ask if they "had him," and another say "yes," but that "he fought like a devil!" Next he felt a rope being passed around his body, lashing his arms tightly to his sides, and, an instant later, helpless, he was being lowered into what he knew from its movements must be a boat. Then he could hear the regular rise and fall of oars between the thole pins and the soft running of water close behind him. Fifteen minutes later, as near as he could judge, he was hoisted in the air; the covering was pulled from his head, the lashings around him cast loose and he found himself standing on the deck of a good sized bark and confronting a red-bearded, surly looking man in a sort of half uniform. On either side of him were a couple of red shirted men, evidently those who had just hoisted him up from the boat. One glance was sufficient for Larry to realize the whole thing. He had been

"shanghied" and by the very old Tasker of whom he and Jim had been talking a short while before. Tasker was short handed, could not get men because of his brutal treatment of them, and being all ready to sail had sent out a kidnapping party to fill the vacant places. The Carstairs was off for a long cruise and Larry was off with her, just as he had gotten ashore from two years of hot suns and hard work. The whole probable future passed like a panorama before his mind's He was standing close to the rail. Old

Tasker was waiting for him to burst out in a torrent of rage and abuse. He wondered at Larry's silence and stood there, eyeing his captive with a demoniacal leer of satis-"Well, I guess yer in fer the v'yage !" he Larry had taken a long header from the Carstairs' rail and, when he struck the water, he went down for ten feet without a stop. Then he struck out horizontally and, with quick strokes made in the direction he knew the shore to be in, all the time keeping under water. At last, when he felt he must have fresh air, he let himself rise slowly that his head made not the least splash as it broke the still water of the bay. Then he took a big draught of fresh air and looked around him. He was nearly a hundred feet from the Carstairs, and he heard "Old Tasker" swearing and bellowing some commands to the boat. Turning his head in the direction of the shore he saw, not twenty feet distant, the boat which he judged had been put out after him. The men were lying on their oars and the officer in the stern was standing up with his back toward him, scanning the bay around him.

It was evident they had not yet detected him. They were looking in every direction but the right one. But it was equally evident to Larry that he could not hope to pass them and get to shore, his only place of refuge, without being seen, when his capture would be only a matter of a short time. The night was dark ; but there was a good deal of phosphorescence in the water and his movements would show him to them very speedily. Swimming under water for that distance was beyond even him, and he was an excellent swimmer.

As the boat lay there, not moving, except for a slight rocking, and he saw them all looking away from him, an idea came to Larry which made him silently sink his head below the water again and strike out under water toward his pursuers.

A few strokes and he allowed himself to rise very gradually. Everything depended upon how accurately he had judged the distance between his first position and the boat. If he had gone three feet too little or too much his capture was insured. What he wanted-what he must do-was to come up immediately under the stern of the Presently, just as he thought his head

With a little maneuvering he moved backward and felt his head rise above the water. He was just under the counter of Presently the boat turned toward shore. In a minute or so he saw the dark outline of one of the bulkheads of the piers. He glanced at the water intervening. There was about 200 feet between him and the shore. He made up his mind to try it. Once again he sank, having taken a long breath, and made for the shore under water.
