"For God, and Home and Native Land." SHALL WE KEEP OUR SALOONS?

₩. C. T. A.

BY MARY H. HULL. One has some very peculiar experiences in starting out to find the law in the land under which a saloon may take up its Strange to find nobody wants it near him, no one but the saloon-keeper himself, and his affection for it is based upon the money there is in it; though he will not have it near his own home if he can afford to live away from it. There seems to be no place for it, poor thing! A decent community of people, who, in these days of layish, complex living, think little and know less about a liquor saloon and all its | really care for your interests as the saloonhell, wakes up some fine morning to find The first remark is, "Why, how is this? Indeed, you'll not put your dirt here among us. Our doors are sacred, our children are decent, and must not smell your breath. Get away! Oh, somebody come quick and attorney, to interpret the law according to take it away! No! no! no!" A flutter and a sputter, then a hopeless acquiescence, a sly selling out of property by those who care enough and can make enough by so doing; while others must remain, tethered by their poverty, or by the smell and contagion of the victorious saloon, which waves its American flag and revenue permit. The people either go in or go away. The rich de not want it, the poor do not want it, the drunkard does not, yet it

Socially, the saloon keeper and his family are not in "good standing," however rich he becomes, for it is inbred in us that the saloon is a public nuisance, a disgrace and an outrage. This speaks well for our social conditions, and proves that after all ship the dollar; but here is the puzzle: The the officials to do it. saloon dollar has dominion and lies at the bottom of an infernal and imperious business; a business which, morally speaking, no living man tries to defend. A sort of maudin saying, "It is sin's necessity. Men o'clock Sunday right and promptly remust and will drink, and somebody must supply. I am a noble martyr ministering to man's sinful necessities. Everybody is trying to run away from the saloon-everybody, except a chosen himself-this nineteenth century monstrosity, the saloon!

The seekers after the law in other decent gaged in the pearl fishery in the vicinity of communities find they may hold their is at zero, or to keep a dainty home free from dust when a bilzzard is blowing. It takes a mighty vigilance to keep one's children from being bitten when dogs have the street, but then it can be done. One can stay inside and let the dogs have it. Villages and small cities can keep the beast at bay if they hide well and defend themselves only from the inside. This monster feels these little hurts to the amount of being annoyed enough to fling his tail in their faces and move on a pace

It is finally found that a block in a city has no protection whatever. The seeker for it has the law respecting a saloon for a neighbor read at headquarters out of a book, but learns that the 200 feet or 500 feet from a church or school, and all that about the consent of house-holders or land-holders is all talk-the exercise of a sort of arbitrary power on the part of a mayor. It is un-American to ask him to use it. He has no solid law to protect him when he enforces it. He lays himself open to having a mandamus served on him, for the saloonmen keep well posted on their advantages; their attorneys stand with fists close to the mayor's face, and say: "Move if you dare; I'm ready." Combined and well organized, the salcon more and more dares to hold "the powers that be" at bay, while whimpering, unorganized, uncombined, scattered, timorous temperance forces come up ence in a while, when aroused by some especially outrageous defiance of the law, and want somebody to do something-"quick!' The fact is, our weak, inefficient, attention to these things leads us exactly

Its five hundred dollars, and if the keeper is a man of good character. What is "a man of good character" Legally, any person who has not been in the penitentiary; one who has not been convicted of crime. A good voting character is any one not a criminal, nor a woman, nor an idiot; so of course he is good enough to run a saloon. Piteously, almost, does a chief executive in this position ask, "Why do not the temperance forces combine? Why do you not men care for their? The executive only stand in the gulf between you and them. We can do only that in which the law protects the official." Personally many an officer of the law would enforce it in the interests of prohibition, if temperance men and women were at his elbow organized, with their attorney beside the saloon's its intent and purpose; to expose and contest every point in which it is being wrested to the liquor traffic's advantage, and to show the executive the law's guarantee for his protection in the face of the saloon's threat to "knife" him if he sets the law's machinery against it.

The law is just as weak or just as strong as the will of the reople that made it, and its executor is no stronger than the law. The mayor and the police of a city need the prohibitionists to stand by them in the execution of the law as strongly as the saloon stands by them in its violation. They are in "a strait betwixt two"-for they are threatened and defied by the liquor traffic and nany of them would be be glad to show thir righteous determinetion to execute the law whatever it br. They have not all gone into office for "boodle." Shall the saloon be kept within this "dollar country" does not quite wor- the law? The prohibitionists must help
