It was quickly seen that the Donald, merchant tailor, Cornwall, Ont. ship was in the path of the fleeing whale, and the captain halloed to the men on board to alter the course of the vessel, and it was evident that the danger was appreclated by the helmsman of the Essex, for the head of the vessel was observed to fall off; but ere she could be swept out of the track the whale struck her with such frightful force that her bows were crushed in, and all three masts were carried away. The vessel immediately filled with water, but remained floating, with her upper deck even with the water, owing to the number of empty barrels in ber 'tween decks.

jons were in the galley when the accident took place, and a barrel of salt pork and one of beef were recovered from the hold a day or two later. For over a week the crew lived on the deck of the ship, hoping to sight a sail; but none appeared, and realizing that they were in an unfrequented part of the Pacific, they took to the boats, with the idea of reaching Valparaiso, the nearest port. A few days following they sighted Ducle's Island, an almost barron land situated in the lattitude of 240 40' south, and the longitude of 124° 48 west.
