Mr. Blake's remarks on the relation of home rule wa Edward Blake, who brought from Canada a keen intelligence, a large experience as a statesman, and a sound judgment, which would be valuable aids in the solu-tion of the Irish problem.

MR. BLAKE'S SPEECH.

Mr. Blake, in responding to the remarks of Mr. Bryce, recalled the fact that the last time he was present at the Eighty Club, the occasion being a dinner in 1888, he sat beside Mr. Charles Stewart Parnell, who, he said, was a leader of men who compelled rather than conciliated the admiration of the masses. Despite all drawbacks he would retain a great place in history. He referred to Mr. Parnell's confidence in the good faith of his liberal allies and his sincerity in his adherence to moderate conreferred to Mr. Parnell's confidence in the good faith of his liberal allies and his sincerity in his adherence to moderate constitutional courses. He believed that Ireland was on the eve of realizing the results that Mr. Parnell fought for. The combined efforts of the liberal sections were certain to attain the common objects they had in view. It was well that each of the allied forces recognizes the conditions under which the other is constituted. The Irish party was created and maintained for a definite object under a strict system of discipline allowing only a limited latitude. Experience had shown the truth of the assertion that the Irish interests in the Imperial parliament required a limited system. The parliamentary weapons forged under Mr. Parnell's leadership had such weight, solidity, temper and keenness, and had wrought such great things for Ireland, that the liberals had taken up the Irish cause in an honorable and cordial alliance, creating a friendly feeling between the Irish and British democracies. The might of Parnell's weapons may have been lessened, but even now they were fully adequate for the original purpose for which they were intended. He hoped that the Irish minority would ultimately see that the tactics of the majority were sound. Every one had the interests of Ireland at heart and desired the passage of an effective home rule bill. It might not be that every detail of the measure would be exactly what some Irishmen would like, but, as Mr. Parnell had once said, any sound measure would be cheerfully accepted. If they worked with a desire to make a success of a substantial measure it would give them a field for action in Ireland which would produce so great a feeling of contentment in that country there would be neither time nor inclination for captious criticism or factious agitation.

THE CANADIAN INTEREST. criticism or factious agitation. THE CANADIAN INTEREST.

Mr. Blake also said that the Canadians had a material interest in the settlement of the Irish question. Like the people of every English speaking nation, they had been troubled about home rule. But they were actuated with a nobler spirit than that of self-interest. They remembered the American revolutionary struggle for home rule and the development of home rule in the Canadian possessions, and sympathized with the condition of a nation of fellow-subjects entitled to and refused selfgovernment. England tried the experiment a century ago of giving Canada sole selfgovernment without the essential condition that the executive should be responsible to and therefore controlled by the people. That was done under the fear that they were incapable of self-government, and the belief that the majority being of the same race and creed would use the power thus obtained to oppress the so-called loyal of home rule, which largely secured the measure have been removed as experience guided. The capital error was the legislative union of Upper and Lower Canada, which failed to extinguish the French national feeling and broke down after twentyfive years' trial, when the federal union was substituted. The results fully justified the advocates of home rule. The hostility. jealousy, and opposition of the two provinces have disappeared. Doubtless the con-stitution of Canada had a seamy side. He belonged to the party numbering half the population, and which for twenty years had been the opposition, and he believed the policy of the government was wrong and injurious. Yet the attachment to home rule was not confined to the dominent party. The minority had rather been misgoverned at home for the moment than well governed from abroad. (Cheers.)
They had a powerful Orange party and bigoted Catholics and Protestants, but the sober, settled thought of the people proved the general adhesion to the principle of civil and religious liberty and equal rights. Minorities throughout the world were apt to be suspicious and exacting. He himself believed that the duty of the majority in-cluded the moral obligation to give the minority, not a grudging measure of strict justice, but a full, overflowing measure. This was the principle he has expounded to Irish meetings with enthusiastic accep-IRELAND'S IMPERIAL INTERESTS.

He was convinced that the respect, loyalty, and affection of the mass of the Canadians towards the United Kingdom owed their vitality and their strength to the concession of home rule. (Cheers.) The difficulties in the case of Canada did not exist in Ireland. Ireland had great Imperial interests in common with England. While she could not claim to partiaffairs, she would be unworthy of herself if she did not take a share in the Imperial affairs. Therefore she strongly opposed the exclusion of Irish members from the exclusion of Irish members from Westminster, which was indefensible in Manvers—to yourself this case; to Mrs. Allan this biscuit box; to Moretto and May rejoiced that it had been eliminated from the present home rule proposals and that the supremacy of the imperial parliament would continue, because while it was hoped that the imperial parliament would not unnecessarily meddle with decisions of the imperial parliament would not unnecessarily meddle with decisions of the imperial parliament would not unnecessarily meddle with decisions of the imperial parliament would not unnecessarily meddle with decisions of the imperial parliament would not unnecessarily meddle with decisions of the imperial parliament would not unnecessarily meddle with decisions of the imperial parliament would not unnecessarily meddle with decisions of the imperial parliament would not unnecessarily meddle with decisions of the imperial parliament would not unnecessarily meddle with decisions of the imperial parliament would not unnecessarily meddle with decisions of the imperial parliament would not unnecessarily meddle with decisions of the imperial parliament would not unnecessarily meddle with decisions of the imperial parliament would not unnecessarily meddle with decisions of the imperial parliament would not unnecessarily meddle with decisions of the imperial and well-wishers as their they may recall the their many friends and well-wishers as to their their many friends and well-wishers as to their their many friends in the first appearance of the favorable impression produced on their their many friends in the first appearance of the first appearance of the first appearance of the favorable impression produced on their first and their their mental the success of the favorable impression produced on their first appearance of the favorable impression produced their first not sunnecessarily medale with decisions of

He hoped the home rule bill would embrace a final settlement of the land question. There were also great Britain social, labor, and electoral questions which he thought might be grappied with during the lifetime of the present parliament. When the home rule bill was launched and moving steadily along he would welcome the progress in its wake of other pressing legislation which would give the masses of Ireland, through their representa ives in parliament, an opportunity to show their sympathy with the just demands of the British people. Blake's remarks on the relation of home rule to other political questions were the voice of common sense.

The Dally News says that Mr. Blake's grasp of the situation was firm and thorough.

The Star says that the speech more than fulfilled the expectation of an authoritative review of the inner working of home rule.

The Times, however, makes a severe criticism, and says that Mr. Blake has no real acquaintance with the problem he purported to treat of. At the best he was only humorous in his speech. When Mr. Blake was referring to a possible rejection of the bill by the house of lords he quoted the proverb:—"It is time enough to bid the devil good morning when you meet him."

Blake was retaring to a possible rejection of canads.
