If there is anything about which you ought to be particular surely the care of your eyes is one of them. Neglect in this has been the rule in the past and is only too common at present.

Most people don't exercise as much care in getting Spectacles as they do in buying gloves, and will purchase from any smooth tongued peddler who, ignorant of everything relating to the matter but the price of his goods, is utterly indifferent to the injury he may inflict upon his customers' eyes.

That there was a real need for better methods than used to prevail here has been fully proved by the public appreciation of our efforts in this direction.

Thoughtful people who find their sight defective come to us for advice. In all cases it is given free.
