The pleasant kitchen with tiled floor and a comforting mass of red coals glowing in an iron basket sticking out of the wall. A kitchen with blackened settles, long benches and tables ringed with many ale cans. A quiet kitchen where only one man was, and he, the ostler, in the big arm-chair asleep.

"Mr. George is coming in here to sleep to-night, Bill," said the landlord, "I take it, his Majesty the King won't trouble him to follow a Christmas Eve. Hot him some ale, a quart of ale, and spread his coat over that chair-back—main wet and main dry Mr. George be, I take it."

"No, he come here (I'll have to go out and kick that dog) and 'is this the 'Deftford road' he says, 'my man' and 'a bad road for a lonely traveller to leave a comfortable public behind on.' And he says, 'My horse is at the post-gate and he'd be better in the stable, and he walks in and orders candles and supper.'"

"I don't tell you? Deftford." They all laughed gaily, and the landlord took out a stone bottle and thick glass tumblers from the corner cupboard. "His Majesty King George, you're so fond of—here's his health, and our gracious Queen Charlotte, and long to reign over us!" George gave the toast, and they drained their glasses.

He stopped abruptly to pour out more spirit. "Oh, let him talk, master," cried the ostler, "it puts heart into a man, it do—talking over old times." George chuckled grimly, and when he had drained his glass, he said cheerfully to me: "It does it. It's all come back to me. It was I in him; and it was me as—He bled very free he did, very free."

He looked at his companion; appreciated the reminiscence in the eyes of George; he let his gold watch and sneezin' box, and nineteen golden guineas in a red silk bag. "Where was that?" "Don't I tell you? Deftford." Outside the bedroom door they held their breath and listened—not a sound but the ticking of the clock below, the rushing of the wind without, and the moaning pliant of the dog.

"His Majesty King George, you're so fond of—here's his health, and our gracious Queen Charlotte, and long to reign over us!" George gave the toast, and they drained their glasses. "Giniver," said the ostler, and added tentatively, "A man could do anything with a dog of murder, he could," assented George. "But it's nothing short of murder would do for that dog o' yours, Jim."
