For The Expositor:
ARISE!
 (St. Mark, ii. 9.)
 Poor sinners, no longer lie prostrate upon thy bed. The Great Physician now is nigh—Thou raise thy drooping head.
 Have faith in His almighty power, On Jesus cast thy soul. Believe in Him this very hour, And He will make thee whole.
 Arise! take up thy bed and live. For thou art now made whole. The Saviour freely does forgive—He hath redeemed thy soul.
 Epiphany, Christmas Eve, 1872. J. L. LAROCHE.

LADY THORNHURST'S DAUGHTER.
 BY MRS. HARRIET LEWIS.
 Author of "The Double Life," "The Court," &c. &c.
 "Come here, Victor," said Lady Thornhurst, as the young Baronet obeyed her summons and approached the window. "Look out! That young girl—is she—is she?"
 Sir Victor's keen eyes sought Tessa's still upturned face.
 "Great heaven!" he muttered. "It's she—it's Tessa."
 In an instant he had bounded away like a shot. Across the drawing-room and the marble paved corridor, out at the open door-way and into the drizzling rain. Too late! Tessa was gone! She had seen and recognized him, and while her heart leaped in joy and pain at sight of him, she dared not meet him. Her safety, and her mother's safety, lay in her flight. With her umbrella drawn low to her head, she hurried out of the light and into the shadow, and then ran across the street toward the centre of the square, halting in the shadow of the iron railings and lowering her umbrella. From this safe retreat she watched Sir Victor as he hurried up and down the street in his evening costume, and questioned the street loungers as to what had become of her, but no one could tell him, and he was at length obliged to reluctantly return to the house. Lady Thornhurst met him in the hall, her face white and her eyes blazing with excitement.
 "You found her?" she breathed.
 "No, answered Sir Victor, scarcely less excited.
 "She was all alone—my poor child! All alone in the night and the rain. What will become of her?"
 "I think she has returned during to-day to Kentish Town, and that seeing some notice of your party, she has come, hoping to get a look at you. She has, without doubt, returned to her friends. Be calm, dear Lady Thornhurst. I am going immediately to Kentish Town. If she is there, I will bring her to you to-night."
 "And if she is not there? O Victor!"
 "If she is not there—bear up, dear Lady Thornhurst!—if she is not at Kentish Town, she may be in the New Kent Road. I learned yesterday that Capt. Holm had a detective watching the house, and I set one to watching it also. I have another to watch Capt. Holm! I will bring your daughter to you safely. Is she not dearer to me than life—my soul?"
 He wrung Lady Thornhurst's hand, and put on his hat, rubbers and great-coat, and rushed out into the night. The Marchioness, sternly controlling herself, put on her mask of gayety again, and returned to her guests. She was nervous and trembling, but no one but Lord Thornhurst observed her agitation. And he ascribed it, with unsleeping jealousy, and in some vague way to Captain Holm. He fancied she had seen him passing the house, or had possibly received a note from him. Meanwhile Tessa, from her retreat, witnessed the hurried departure of Sir Victor, Cheswick, and her heart told her that he was going in search of her. She waited a little longer, but the Marchioness did not again appear at the window, and Tessa, again putting up her umbrella crossed the square in the shadow, and moved swiftly down Hall-kim street on her way back through Grosvenor to Piccadilly. As she was turning the corner of Grosvenor Place, she ran full against a person coming from the opposite direction. The two umbrellas came in quick collision, and Tessa's was torn from her hand, falling to the ground. The stranger—a man—picked up the fallen article, and handed it to Tessa, bowing courteously. As he did so, the watery gleam of a street lamp fell on his face. Tessa recognized him. He was Captain Holm!
 "I beg your pardon, Ma'am, or Miss," said the Captain gallantly. "By Jove! It isn't Tessa."
 The suddenness and strangeness of the rencontre seemed for the moment to paralyze Holm. Taking advantage of his momentary stupefaction, Tessa leaving the umbrella in his hand, fled down Grosvenor Place like a scared fawn. The Captain pursued her, calling upon her to stop. She turned into Piccadilly, and ran down that thoroughfare, nearly deserted on this wet February night, and did not slacken her speed until her breath began to fail her. And on came the Captain at a furious speed, yelling to her at the top of his voice. At last the girl wearied, and could go no further. A dull terror and despair seized upon her. She turned into a narrow street opening out of Piccadilly, and crept into the shadow of a deep and dark door-way, her heart beating like a drum. And on came Holm in swift pursuit.
