Alison's luck was made the subject of not a little serious comment, and there were not wanting those who said that she would be easily consoled for the past by the dazzling prospects of the future.

THE FORTUNES OF ALISON HOPE.

CHAPTER V.

Henry Goodall did not deliver Jesus's letter to Alison. This would have been to play the part of a burglar. He merely threw it into the fire, and sat thinking of it all night, and he was not a little flattered in the grate. Guild was not missed by anybody for a day or two, but at the end of that time, Goodall having prudently sent his longings to enquire after him and then to Mrs. Hope's to see if they knew anything about his whereabouts, and having a polite knock of "wondering what had become of his clerk" when any townsman appeared, the effect was such that the mysterious "disappearance" was in all mouths.

On the morning of the fourth day Goodall felt it to be his duty to make a call at the widow's cottage.

"Mrs. Hope," he began, when he was once seated in the widow's parlour, "I hope you will excuse the interval which has elapsed between my clerk's disappearance and my visit to you. The fact is, I had been unwilling to come to you till I could throw some light upon the mystery. It is absolutely certain that he took the coach for Pettycourt, and as certain that he crossed the ferry, but I am not sure that he has left all traces of him in his boat. Yesterday I felt it was incumbent upon me to examine his books, and I regret that the examination proved so unsatisfactory that a reason for his absence might be looked for in accounts amounting to a considerable extent—some hundreds of pounds—a serious loss, no doubt, but if he had confided in me, we might have arranged the discrepancy without making the scandal public, though it would have been quite impossible for me to retain him in my employment. I feel very deeply, old friends, at having to make such a revelation. I will be glad if you can help me in any way to keep it secret. For your sakes, I am determined to give the affair no publicity."

Elsie had turned quite faint while Henry Goodall was making this statement, but Mrs. Hope soon found words—

"To think of that! I am grateful to a Higher Power that has kept Alison true to her duty, and her companionship in spite of my ill-luck. I am sure that your kindness to me, that base ingratitude!"

The deserted bride did not speak, but the staid man took her hand, and when Henry Goodall took his leave, she returned to her room, and she was not a little surprised to find that she had been so long in the house, and she was not a little surprised to find that she had been so long in the house, and she was not a little surprised to find that she had been so long in the house.

Alison's luck was made the subject of not a little serious comment, and there were not wanting those who said that she would be easily consoled for the past by the dazzling prospects of the future.

THE FORTUNES OF ALISON HOPE.

CHAPTER VI.

Two years had passed away since the disappearance of Joseph Goodall from Anstruther, when a weather-stained and brown-complexioned stranger, arrived, one morning by the mail coach at the door of the Black Bull Inn. He had breakfasted there, and he had been in the little parlour, and then he had engaged a bed-room for the night, and he had inquired after the property of the house, and then he had inquired after the property of the house, and then he had inquired after the property of the house.

Alison's luck was made the subject of not a little serious comment, and there were not wanting those who said that she would be easily consoled for the past by the dazzling prospects of the future.

CHAPTER VII.

The deceased man had an intention of bequeathing the inheritance long respected in Anstruther burgh. The bolts looked the leading shops were shut, and men and women were seen to bestow upon the dead. He had been a man of high reputation, and his name was spread far and wide, and his name was spread far and wide, and his name was spread far and wide.
