EXPENSE ACCOUNT .- It would surprise many a merchant, if he should examine his expense account, item by item, carefully and thoroughly, for the past three months, to see in how many ways he could have saved in this and in that. Too much rent, to much clerks' hire, too many leaks, too little attention to details-these are the rocks upon which many a wellfreighted and staunch trade vessel has been stranded. A merchant cannot be too care-

The world moves and so does Beaverton But, apart from the movement partaken of by Beaverton, as an inseparable fraction of this earthly stool, the place has already progress this season. In fact their have been more buildings erected here during the summer, than for many years previously-including quite a number of very fair and tolerably handsome residences, and a
