OUR EXPORT TRADE. Some good advice from a disinterested standpoint was given by Mr. Arch. MacNeilage, of Glasgow, in a talk on "Canadian Live Stock Products exported to Britain and how to improve that trade." He said that Great Britain must consume the surplus products of other countries. Canadian cattle and beef were good, but not as good as the best beef from the United States. The demand in Great Britain was altogether for "baby beef"; at the Smithfield show they had no classes for old animals. Many were putting steers on the market at 22 months old. detriment, of course, of the nobility. Much of the bitterness with which the Russian nobles regard both the Czar and his government is due undoubtedly to the fact that they feel themselves in a false position owing to the power which, as they maintain, ought to be in their hands being in the hands of men who are for the most part their social inferiors. The Tchinovniks practically stand between them and their sovereign, for their only means of approaching him is through them. This state of things they naturally resent bitterly;

perors tip when the butler and footman speed them as the parting guest, says the London Chronicle. After his stay here for Queen Victoria's funeral the German Emperor left £5,000 for the servants at Windsor and Osborne. But until vigorous action was taken by the Prince Consort, even larger donations were expected of the sovereign's visitors. It was the visit of the Czar Nicholas I. that led to reform. After a week's stay at Windsor he left £20,000 for the royal servants, and Napoleon III. was equally extravagant. In the interests of her poor relations Queen Victoria set a reasonable limit to her servants' perquisites. The only visitor who disregarded this regulation was the late King of Holland,
