Which Goes to Show That if Adventures Are Hard to Find They Are Equally Hard to Get Out of When Once Found.

"Adventures are pretty hard to find when you are looking for them," said my friend the traveler as he lighted a fresh cigar. "In company with a friend of mine, Jack Barney-maybe you knew him, mighty good fellow-I took a bicycle trip around the world once and arranged to send a weekly letter to my home paper. Well, sir, that was the deadest and flattest trip I ever took in my life. Not a ripple in it, barring quarrels with guides But the Englishman Didn't Appreciand hotel keepers, and the letters grew so tame it is a wonder to me they were ever used. It was in China that Jack one day mays to me:

" 'See here, old man, we've simply got to put some excitement into this trip. Now, I propose we have an adventure this afternoon.

"Naturally I was willing, and when we got back to the hotel I wrote it up. We were going through the Street of Seven Moons when upon a balcony, set back in a huge inclosure, we saw the most magnificent beauty I have ever laid eyes on She was of European extraction without question, as we could see clear from the street, although dressed in Chinese garb. and we involuntarily stopped to look at her As we did so she motioned us, with an evident sign of distress, to come to her, and without a moment's hesitation we scaled the stone wall and entered the open door on the ground floor, noting before we went in that the woman was leaving the balcony. She met us at the foot of the stairs and came running to me, sobbing, with her hands extended, and grasp-

We made a desperate resistance, but an unavailing one, and we were taken into a rear room, where we were horrified to see them uncover a circular well, into which it was their evident intention to thrust us Here we made another terrific struggle. but the odds were too greatly against us. and we were thrust one after the other into this dark and ill smelling chasm. It was rather deep, but a heap of fine dust, among which we later distinguished half crumbled bones, broke our fall, so that we lay stunned only for a little and then awoke to the full terrors of our position The walls, we found, were perfectly smooth and offered no foothold of any kind, and, worse than all, we could tell by certain sounds above that they were building over the iron plate above with brick and cement.

"We were to be starved or suffocated whichever came first. Already the air was stifling, and our breath seemed to fairly scorch our tongues Oh, it was

My friend paused in reminiscence for awhile, and at last I reminded him that I was greedily interested in his tale. "How on earth," said I, "did you ever manage to get out of there alive?" "We didn't," he said. "There was simply no way to do it. We tried and tried to figure it out, but at last we gave it up. " 'It's no use, old man,' Jack said to me as he sat across the table. 'We've got it too strong. Let's just cut it out and go

If the light waves strike anything on the way down, they are very apt to be made longer, or rather they are apt to be turned into heat Now, the waves which form light are so short that they will readily pass through glass, but the waves which form heat are so long that they will not pass through From this, therefore, you may see why a bothouse remains hot. The energy from the sun passes into the house through the glass roof in the form of light. Then it strikes the objects in the house and is turned to heat.

But this heat cannot pass out through the glass. The heat waves are too long. So the light keeps coming in, and the heat keeps accumulating, and soon the hothouses become very warm indeed, even on the coldest days in winter.

Of course our dwelling houses are heated by the sun in the same way. The light comes in through the windows, but the heat cannot pass out.
