If you should take the cars as you actually find them running today you would find them to average a length of about 35 feet and a weight of 15 tons as against the oldtime 28-foot, 10-ton freight car.

"As to the load now carried, it is pretty difficult to strike an average. but that could probably be set down at 25 tons, as against the old-time maximum 10-ton load, making the present day average box car and load together weigh 40 tons, against the old time total of 20 tons.

"And now if you will take a train of to-day of sixty loaded cars, which is far below the average for level roads, you will find a big engine hauling a train of twice as many cars as were hauled in an old-time train, and these loaded cars weighing twice as much, or sixty cars of a total load of 40 tons each, as against thirty cars of 20 tons each, making the total load hauled now four times the old load, or

And, as we have seen, in the most modern cars the proportion of the freight weight carried to the dead weight is larger still.
