I climbed up on to the heath you would have harder work and duller - again, and wandered across it as nearly out of my mind as a man could be. With the ever he thought that anyone might have a blood singing in my ears, and my naked claim upon him, he took the first opportunsword still clutched in my hand, I walked aimlessly on until, looking round me, I found to you that it hurt me after all that had that I had come as far as the glade of the passed between us. He led on to the Abbot's Beech, and saw in the 'distance that gnarled stump which must ever associated with the most terrible moment of my life. I sat down upon a fallen trunk with my sword across my knees and my head between my hands, and I tried to think about what had happened and what would happen in the future.

The Emperor had committed himself my care. The Emperor was dead. Those were the two thoughts which clanged in my head, until I had no room for any other ones. He had come with me and he was dead. I had done what he had ordered when living. I had revenged him when dead. But what of all that? The world would look upon me as responsible. They might even look upon me as the assassin. What could I prove? What witnesses had I? Might I not have been the accomplice of these wretches? Yes, yes, I was eternally dishonoure -the lowest, most despicable creature in all France. This then was the end of my fine military ambitions-of the hopes of my mother. I laughed bitterly at the thought. And what was I to do now? Was I to go into Fontainebleau, to wake up the palace, and to inform them that the great Emperor had been murdered within a pace of me! I could not do it-no, I could not do it! There was but one course for an honourable gentleman whom Fate had placed in so cruel a position. I would fall upon my dishonoured sword, and so share, since I could not avert the Emperor's fate. I rose with my nerves strung to this last piteous deed, and as I did so, my eyes fell
