CHRYSLER'S FARM.

The unveiling on Wednesday of the monument which marks the spot upon which was fought the battle of Chrysler's Farm gives us another permanent memorial of the patriotism and valour of the early settlers, who, in the face of overwhelming numbers, went forth to protect the country from the invader and to save it to the Empire of which it forms a part. No excuse has yet been given for the attacks upon Canada and Canadians in 1812 and 1813; no justification has been offered for the attempts to despoil an industrious and inoffensive people who were quietly making homes for themselves in what was then the northern wilderness. If there was no cause for hostile action against Canada, there was abundant reason for defensive operations. The property of the people was endangered by the American marauders; the political future of the country was at stake. Of the pioneers who participated in the dangerous task of protecting the country, none were more zealous than those of the East. With laudible enthusiasm they sprang to arms; with unwavering courage they faced the adversary and defeated him. Chrysler's Farm was one of the points at which the conflict raged. Here four thousand Americans were met by eight hundred regulars and militia men, and were dispersed, horse, foot and artillery. Mrs. J. D. Edgar, in her "Ten Years of Upper 'Canada," gives an account of engagement as written by Lieut.-Col. Harvey, then adjutant-general. At two o'clock on the 11th of November, 1813, says Lt.-Col. Harvey, the enemy suddenly showed his columns in the woods. They consisted of the heavy brigades of infantry, a considerable amount of cavalry, several field pieces, and a body of riflemen. "As the enemy advanced, "I plainly saw we had nothing to trust "to but to every man doing his duty. I "was convinced we had, with eight "hundred men to meet in the open field "a force of not less than 4,000, and strong "in an arm of which we were wholly "destitute—cavalry." Regarding the first attack, Col. Harvey is a trifle satirical. He says the Canadian light troops were forced back, and "the enemy advanced at the pas de charge a la Française, which was quickly changed by "a well-directed fire from our field "pieces to one more commingling with "the dignity of the American nation." In other words, the invading troops began to run. When the Americans had rallied they offered a heavy but irregular fire, which the British returned with greater effect by regular firing of platoons and wings. The American field pieces did important service. Upon these the Canadians charged, and succeeded in capturing one of them. By steady and continuous firing on the part of the British the enemy was ultimately driven from the field, suffering the loss of six or seven hundred men, killed or wounded, and leaving behind one hundred prisoners. The Canadians counted 180 of the American dead after the retreat. On the British side the loss was 170. Three days after this reverse General Covington, the commander of the invading forces, who had been wounded in the engagement, died, and a few days later the expedition against Canada ended, as an American historian puts it, in disaster and disgrace. Chrysler's Farm was one of the important and decisive actions of the memorable campaign. There the Canadians, co-operating with the regulars, by steadiness and coolness overcame the superior numbers of the invaders, and while protecting their own firelines, contributed to the preservation of Canada to the British Crown. It is right that this action should be remembered. It is all right that the Dominion Government should erect a memorial, as it is doing to-day, which shall speak forever of the patriotism and bravery of the Canadians, who defended their country against an attack upon its liberties that was as wicked as it was wanton and malignant.—Mail and Empire of Wednesday.
