But how comes it that France cannot live within her income? The question is easier put than answered, for the most eminent French statesmen and economists are themselves at variance on the subject. Among the causes, however, is the costly administration of the country, which entails the existence of a whole army of more or less useful officials.

France suffers from a prague of functionaries, of Jacks-in-office. It is the sole ambition in life of a vast number of middle-class Frenchmen to secure a Government position of some kind or another, however small. Members of Parliament are pestered with applications for Government posts, all generally backed up and exert his influence in this direction, friends will vote against a man "who doesn't find any places."

If you happen to have a nitremine in your back garden, the King is perfectly at liberty to send someone to dig out the mineral. The cld law which gave the Crown this right has never been repealed.
